THE PREFACE.

How unfit and how unworthy a choice I have made of my selfe, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reason though exceeding weake, hath sufficiently resolved mee. For had it beene begotten then with my first dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet wel have doubted that the darkness of Age or Death would have covered over both It and Mee, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travailes, to have set together (as I could) the unjoynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the universall: in whom, had there beene no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adversity, the former enforcing, the later perswading, have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subject of every opinion, wise or weake.

To the world I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have I abated thereof, (Fortune changing) I fled much better in any age. For Prosperity and Adversity have evermore tyed and untied vulgar affections. And as we see by experience, That dogs doe alwayes barke at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who wanting that vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of G O D which we call Charity in Christian men; condemn without bearing, and condemn without offence given: led thereunto by uncertain report only, which the Malice truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all tyes. ^{Democritus} Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: time ^{Eccl. ii. v. 1.} derstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witnesse, without judge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave Saint Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evill. And herein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientia satisfacimus, nihil in famam laboremus, Regulator vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let us satisfie our owne consciences, and not not trouble our selves with fame; bee it never so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well

For my selfe, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prized it before my private: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of her excellent person, I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the world, hath taken the account: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parva, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of pbenzie, not of hope, seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travaile the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Earth, & of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon flime & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and heare, & among those that are, whom we see & converse with, every one hath received a severall picture of face, and every one a divers picture of minde; every one a forme apart, every one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions, so strong a contrariety of inclinations, so many natural & unnatural; wise, foolish, manly, & childlike affections and passions in mortall men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe: yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree, so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to ghesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neere the life, did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and maske over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may bee sometimes seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude, Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus: The common people are evill Judges of honest things, and whose Wisedome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better sort, every understanding bath a peculiar judgement, by which it both censureth other men, & valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worbleffe papers torn with Rats: seeing the slothfull Censurers of all ages have not spared to taxe the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition, the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie, the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into evill, seeing Solomon complained long since; and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Ecclesiast. Nihil scilicet quam reprehendere re alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who have left the memories of time past to after ages, to give, as neere as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words, I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefices, for which it hath bin honoured, in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our understanding, since the world it selfe had life and beginning, even to this day: yea, it hath triumphed over time, which besides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of yeares, and given so faire and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus. The wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and againe repopled: How Kings and Kingdomes have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our owne like errors & ill deserving. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupidified mindes, as to make us remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make us remember, That the justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that beateen wisdomesse confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickednesse, thinke hee can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS judgements in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeed, and have not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS judgements upon the greater and greatest have beene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point farre off, and to speake of the conversion of Angells into Divells, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharaoh, when hee sue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practice, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed, to make themselves and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, & the rest, no fruit, no flower, grass, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots and ruines doe hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is eyther overturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diversly given by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraign force, or by inward negligence & dissention, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk downe under their owne weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboraret sua: Others, That the divine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of every Estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my selfe a day over to resolve.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, have undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to travaile after, and overtake farre-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, & their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in divine & humane letters, the successe of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same patternne.

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up a-like with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne private; Or otherwise best suiteth with his apprehension. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable: neither is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and wont to give his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that if may no lesse appeare appeare by evident proofe, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath alwayes beene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, overreacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with above a hundred and fifty others: that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious; yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Uncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and misearchable judgement of GOD revenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwayes tooke himselfe for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu & Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those daies as others have done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the murder of Gloucester; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents): Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weake, & his obtaining the Crowne traitorous: who brake faith with the Lords at his Landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should live. After that hee had enjoyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from conspiracies & rebellions: he saw (if soules immortall see & discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, & his Son the Prince, suddenly and without mercy murdered: the possession of the Crowne (for which hee had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, and by the Issues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse, by entailing the same upon his owne Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the sixth, had brured the hopes of every Competitor, under the despair of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so have judged, were not this passage of Causation also true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ: A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to overturne the things, that seemed to have beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) & married the daughter of Anjou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster, He drew on himselfe & this kingdom the greatest joynt-losse & dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit une fort gentille Prince; mais son reigne est advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That hee was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a verie unfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practisers and contrivers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the Queene had been absolute: the Queene in respect of her personall wound, spretæque injuria formæ, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed, the success to the Counsell. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments and armes, in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, deposed Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdom. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she lived to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her only son the Prince, were bewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it? Shee lived to see her selfe deposed of her Estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Earldome of Provence and other places for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to become a starke Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yeelded since the world was. Sirach. 19.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one only Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than any of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one that escaped the judgement of GOD in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himselfe had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour, taught him also by the same Art to kill his own sons and successors, Edward and Richard. For those Kings which have sold the blood of others at a low rate, have but made the man: et for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the Fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that playd with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he easily alured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: secondly, hee wrought their consent to have them imprisoned: and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads severed from their bodies. And having now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept which the Devill hath written on every post, namely, To depresse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee urged that argument so far and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the young King himselfe, & of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his Brother, should have able yeares to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that curleesse wrong, offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Divell, who never dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Catesby, who founded him, that he was not for dable, He first resolved to kill him sitting in councill: wherein having failed with his sword, He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before he ate his dinner. A greater judgement of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of law, or offence given) by Hastings advice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings himselfe in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same law-lesse manner had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

The Preface.

But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; Hee had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischiefs & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion: and after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephewes & Natural Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7. cut off, and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A politick Prince he was if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beat downe and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affectiō in the hands of his profit, so he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the 11. whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like, but he was far more just, & began not their processe whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himselfe gave, he himselfe received back the thanks & the love, knowing it well that the affectiōs of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever the taking off of Stanleys head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his sume it ruined againe: no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundance flowers from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Fire? How many wives did he cut off, & cast off, as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to have given his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolkke the Father, & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his owne ho-now, & the Kings service; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped upon the Fatherlesse and Widowes at home: and besides the ruaine enterprizes abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the first? What Lawes and Wils did he devise to establish this Kingdome in his owne Issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same root that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase, though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have beene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace; from whence His Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eye: yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foule spots by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) have bin defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the sword of his justice, with which the most that fore-went him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truly be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath staied the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That he never tooke revenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Prince did: That his Majesty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Majesties preceding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long reigne.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittain to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England; which though they were severed but by small brookes and banks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Majesty hath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, & heap them up to their hight, they will appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdome received from GOD, certainly the peace betwene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more enabled enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, & conquests. It is true that hereof we doe not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588. joyned the army which he commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; & had his Majesty at the same time declared himselfe against us in the North: it is easie to divine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur have brought this union a farre greater praise than it hath since cost us. It is true, that there was never any Comon weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein noman had cause to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinit to examine every mans cause, or to relieve every mans wants. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne. Offers of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men doe not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitudo of knowledge, yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in divine, as humane understanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, & withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne commandement were knockt in pieces and cast into the fire. For ill Artifts, in setting out the beauty of the externall, and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leave to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this brieft discourse) with His Majesties temperate, revengelesse and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even hand: and withall but bestow every deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so just cause to complaine, as the King himselfe hath. Now as wee have told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is every where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, & unnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt Hee with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, and heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisoning imprisonments, and civill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure guard, all the daies of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet God raised up against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him: his own sons, with whom (to satisfie their ambition) he had shared his estate, and given them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to govern, during his owne life. Yea his eldest son Lothaire (for he had foure, three by his first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, That hee had used violence towards his brothers and kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be slaine. Eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus, & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permiserit. Becaus he used violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which hee performed in the Generall Assembly of the States, it follows: Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, pœnitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat: After this hee did openly confesse himselfe to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius, hee underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his owne Nephew.

Pep. Madox

This he did; and it was praise-worthy. But the Bloud that is unjustly spilt, is not againe gathered up from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This King, as I have said, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second son hee gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bavier: and to Charles, whom he had by a second wife called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitaine, thereby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his sonne Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his son Loys of Bavier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight neere to Auxerre the most bloody battaile that ever was stroken in France: in which, the marvellous losse of Nobility, & men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall upon Almaine; & the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the bald by treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster: Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eyes of his son Carloman, Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the bald, the Uncle oppresseth his Nephewes the Sonnes of Lothaire, hee usurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier his elder Brother; Baviens armies and his Sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, & the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Jew his Physician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke. Beque had Charles the simple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his Neck, the younger is slain by a wild Bore; the son of Baviere had the same ill destiny, and brake his Neck by a fall out of a window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germany; where with not contented, he invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, he dies a distracted beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes: and lastly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, he is forced to dye in the prison of Peron. Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breaks his Neck in chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes himselfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire, who after he had once apparelled injustice with authority, his sonnes and successours tooke up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable & naked beggars. The wretched successie they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemaine, men had more meddling than either God, or Justice had.

But to come neerer home, it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fault) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himselfe, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poore people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himselfe of the fault, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, to doe justice upon the Murderers, threatening his sonne with GODS judgements, if he neglected it. But this unseasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry himselfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery, wee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vasilowick of Moscovia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having beene the most mercilesse. For, besides those of his own Blood and Nobility, which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom hee cut in pieces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say, besides these, and the slaughterer of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cosenger-mans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gurtiere his great Treasurer, and all his kindred, & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteene yeares, and the other fourteene, he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Dean to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to levy (by his favour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Altramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance, which, but for the Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never beene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoigne, who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Coëstence, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pré, Hector of Chartres, and in effect all the officers of justice, of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasury, and request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to governe, and to have mastered France: He was soon after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Lovers of other mens miseries: and misery found them out.

French incontinin day 1495.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragoni was the first: and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong band, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Navarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tyed unto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonfálvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with childe, with her untimely birth, at once & together buried. His eldest daughter married unto Don Alpho Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his necke in her presence; and being with childe by her second, died with it. A just judgement of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutchesse of Visco. The second daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, He saw cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand have masters of a new name, and by a strange family are governed and possesse.

Charles the fifth, son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vaine enterprises upon the French, upon the Almanes, and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines were consumed: who gave the while a most perillous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken, was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany, and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug, and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice, having hoped to swallow up all those dominions where-in hee concocted nothing save his owne disgraces. And having, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare, to his sonne Philip, from whom hee very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, (wrested by his ancestors from Jaqueline their lawfull Princeesse) & to possesse in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischievous Cardinall of Granvile, and other Romish Tyrants, not onely forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobilitie of those countries, not onely forgot the Present made him upon his entry, of forty millions of Florens, called the Novalle aide; nor onely forgot that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priviledges, and customes, which they had enjoyed under their thirtie and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constrain them, and entrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intolerable impositions; hee lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread under his feet all their Naturall and fundamentall Lawes, Priviledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which dispensation was the true cause of the war and bloodshed since then;) & after he had tried what he could performe, by dividing of their owne Nobility, and the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granvile, He employed that most merciles Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom hee first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gavare: & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, and cut off in those six yeares (that Alva governed of Gentlemen & others, eightene thousand and sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished end, having it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for Governour his bastard brother Don John of Austria, a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he, using the same Papall advantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath upon the Holy Evangelists, to observe the treaty made with the Generall States; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers therein garrisoned: Towards whose Pay & Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600. thousand pounds. Which monies received, He suddenly surprised the Citadels of Antwerpe & Nemures: not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have possesse himselfe of all the mastering places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended, Hee held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escovedo, Rhodus, Barlemon, and others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny, formerly practised, and now againe intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six yeares, and most cruelly slain Man, woman, and child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had consumed sixe and thirty millions of treasure in six yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish want, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milk-tubbes: Hee departed the country no other wise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arrivall. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himselfe overcame the greatest difficulties; though his judgement were over-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers jealousie and distrust, with the untimely death that seized him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Escovedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine upon some new project, Hee was at the first arrivall, and before any access to the King, by certain Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsell and successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, & the lives of above foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gave place to none, and for revenue did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation which most willingly obeyed him, and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despayre of all his forces become a free Estate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppresse them.

The Preface.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtlety, have these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers: and in the end have brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said it and performed it ever. Perdant sapientiam sapientum; I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times wee have, wee hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selves; or persuade our selves, that GOD hath given us letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behinde us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: wee are by it joynd to the earth: wee are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heavens are high, farre off, and unsearchable: we have sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them: seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Esay cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleevd our reports? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleevd, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof be in every mans mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an universall dissimulation? Wee professe that we know GOD: but by workes wee deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life: for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non est divinum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personall battred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neere driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soone resolve, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven; and that the World it selfe were but used as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while wee act in gesture and voyce, divine vertues, in all the course of our lives wee renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in termes, like the Philosophers: Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Solomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God; that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which wee purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed bee the markes, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that ever man had, hath told us that this is the use: When goods increase (saith Solomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in faire weather: they againe forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde, leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Master Danner, and use his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fifth, after the resignation of his estates, staid at Ulmsing for winde, to carry him his last journey into Spaine, He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke up the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, Hee said thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of fouldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his owne domestick servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no means goe about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reverend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their justice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most virtuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who when he is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The second is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behinde us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may be truly said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits mortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other joy of their posterity which succeed, than their doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth all up a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non interfunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conversant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Job; who tels us, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee understand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew unto man, what shall be after him under the Sun? Hee therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travaile in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof: which made mee (saith hee) endeavour even to abhorre mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Esay confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knowes us not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall never behold the dawne till his returne that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse joy; nor any returne of forgone and mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them, no man can assure us; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so divide the joyes of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference knowne unto us) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall wee therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessary and vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees: which hath given greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heavenly bodies: which hath made differences betwene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub; and amongst trees, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and understanding of their Ancestors: so (seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other mens pity;) I account it foolishnesse to condemne such a care. Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæsitæ: so Jeremy cries, Woe unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equity: and Esay the same, Woe to those that spoile and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet: for such are the wayes (saith hee) of every one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selves but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever: I say, if both, so wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing: it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves after the world were but mortall.

But let every man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all foolies, that cannot equall his abundance; the Revenger esteeme all negligent, that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician, all grosse that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winde drive us, & when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the Navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad & severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is only then, that we are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport, and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amendment) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have us said, that we ended well for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men doe not oppose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say unto God as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falsehoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall prejudice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to have beene unjust, (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God; or made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleventh wore in his Cappe, which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one evill act more, and so should be the last, which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnac to be stabbed to death: mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the ever-living God. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they feare all that is durelesse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men, which beate but upon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous; be they friends or Kings: yea they dive under water, like Duckes, at every pebble stone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible judgements of the All-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slaves towards men, towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched; wee shall finde the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to enterchange (witness the sudden downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of eyther, or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vchut, incertum est, What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. James) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found; for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth adversity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the cleernesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will, to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For bee it that wee

have lived many yeares, and (according to Solomon) in them all wee have rejoyced; or be it that we have measured the same length of dayes and therein have evermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, sayled out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So as whosoever hee bee, to whom Fortune hath bene a servant; and the Time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for wee have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and hee shall finde that all the Art which his elder yeares have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavie, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow up after our fast-springing youth; overtake it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, & from our now being, the poore, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines, as bee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-past pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behinde us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Onely those few humble Swannes I must except: who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retayning the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selves, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second wee complaine to our selves against GOD: as if hee had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites; or for taking them againe from us having had them; forgetting that humble & just acknowledgement of Job, the Lord hath given, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse, to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole, or ungratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meanes soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soever his afflictions bee, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wife man call the adversities of the world but tributa vivendi, the tributes of living: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & heare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, & resolvedly, & not as those whining souldiers doe, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, & appointed us all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world. That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar.

The Preface.

a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; The appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Saporos:) that made Bellifarius play the most victorious Captaine, & lastly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weaknes prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgetteth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato: To fall under Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retreat; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and wishall, that the good intent, which hath moved mee to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also bee accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neere, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: (Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that have seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, have gone about to dis-joyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by Faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresse of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary even in the judgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeved, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no lesse strange; that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) have so retrenched their mindes from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantasie, or curious. But doeth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubted grounds and principles in-

indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power; may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of ^{Charron des Sages} ^{1. li. 1. c. 1.} wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorité quel'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and impartiall judgement of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo iudicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; & suffer themselves after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which (soth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Divinity in a Pillory, and written over the first, Contranegantem Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of Learning within the lanthorne of Aristotles braines: or that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these bee the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not reason: and so hath experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sourenesse doth it: whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grasse under his feet, why it should be greene rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action & Effect, telling us what it works (which all men knew as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an idiot in the next cause of his owne life; and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Mankinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the mores of the Aire for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, have it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis invictis opinionibus tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One eternall and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the universall. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut Providentiam unam esse consentiant: five enim Natura, five Æther, five Ratio, five mens, five fatalis necessitas, five divina Lex; idem est quod à nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Laëtantius) though uncertain, come to this, That they agree upon one Providence, whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or understanding, or destinie, or divine ordinance, that it is the same which we call G O D. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; doe at last find, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosphicall contemplation and curiosity; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have beene eternall, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere, They seeme unto me, which affirme this, to give part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither beene Author, nor father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it selfe to God, or God accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first, it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans will. For the second, it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than served to receive the form of the Universall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the worke of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter, than sufficed, then God did dissolve & annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable sonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Againe, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotisme. For; if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it selfe; nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit; neq; seipsum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth precede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest, Those that saine this matter to be eternall, must of necessity confesse, that Infinite cannot bee separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter lest no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, whosoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnesse of that kind, as wanteth tearmes to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if such had beene Gods Will) as the Sea bath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reason it selfe finds it more easie for infinite power, to deliver from it selfe a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a soule and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in una existentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the world universall closed up all of G O D: For the most part of his workes (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom bee opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded and made finite. And hereof it comes, That wee seldom esteeme G O D the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the world (nothing) be taken in the affirmative, and the making, imposed upon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesse, quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum: That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude fallly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the world Universall, & all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum, and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world universall, but particularum Universaliter, and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the universality and the infinity itself; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other to prove the worlds eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect therof is also granted. Inferring that God being for ever a sufficient & effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also have bin for ever, to wit, the world universall. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confesse a sufficient & effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent, & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion, to make God free in power, & bound in will, able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of naturall necessity, which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but worke matter being present: as fire, to burne things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can worke, and doth not worke, if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moved by it selfe, or by somewhat else: and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by him selfe, nor by any other: but being always the same, doth alwayes worke. Whence he concludeth, If the world were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof: and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that Gods performing indue time that, which be ever determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for ever, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others add further, that the Patterne or Image of the World may be said to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, critique semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, cecedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper: retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus: That representative, or the intentionall world (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall bee. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confesse: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consumation of this world, there shall be a new Heaven and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternall and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

The Preface.

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissippable) is continued, & knit to the Divine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity, & that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and understanding divine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued & knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little, even as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, doe by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end, and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never scene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the elder by continuance; or in any sort other wise than they were; which had they been subject to finall corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newnesse, and that they have not continued so long, than that they wil continue for ever as they are. And if conjecturall arguments may receive answer by conjectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may bee found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Suns heate, neither were the Seas, under the Equinoctiall, navigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we Navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of deluges; and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heate.

But in a Word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things have beene digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to have beene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleev'd, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rockes, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Celestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we have reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of prooffe, as that this world shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection: if the World were were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and dye?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should travaile betwene the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moon to live by borrowed light: the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sunne by his perpetuall travaile within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne have of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may justly be called eternall Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and beggar; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortal. And what were this, but to beleve againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But instead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discerne it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit: Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles Physicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fift of his Metaphysicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodians; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is answerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam: He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubiq; Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversa facere: sublata vero mediorum materialiumq; diversitate, vel unicū, vel simi-limum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diversity of meanes, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diversity of meanes, and the diversity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heaven and Earth, it had then both understanding and will; it had counsell to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to governe: without which all things had been but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven, or all of the matter of Earth. And if wee grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsell, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to Divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesq; summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and arise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest, I doe also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will, & maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honour & dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it self. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavie things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Seas? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they doe, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, & such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doe yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquitie, and by all men truly learned that ever the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have bin delivered by divine letters, as the waters were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rationally than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and dye?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should travaile betwene the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moon to live by borrowed light: the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheeke; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Waters

The Preface.

Waters of a running river do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

This much I say it is, that Reason it self hath taught us: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere, Sapience goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth absoluti boni Scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Isidore) is not extorted by violence, but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, & by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret judgement, & the causes, is not an affect of Reason. Sed cum ratione insaniunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire arret au but qu'on naescu surpasser, For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so, as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite power is every where in the world; and yet how every where, it cannot inform us: our believe hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsutable division of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this Age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto subducimur, We are stolen away from our selves, getting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on mee, because I believe as hee doth; That who so thinks himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves; from selfe love, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Worke, I have onely taken counsell from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downe-fall of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time, and preserved it selfe, from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (so which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which wee may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appear here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages doe belong the report of many Inventions therein found; and from them derived to us; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diversity of Government; they had Kingly rule, Nobility, Policy in war; Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should have left a great deal of Nakednesse, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have made also many others: which if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the waies of our lives: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression, I may the better be excused, in writing their lives & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preacht unto us. But we still make large digressions: yea, the Teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the affaires of the nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground upon the Persians; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their severall beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers: who seldom give names to those small brookes, whereof many, joyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, & the stile not every where like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latin Character in S. Senensis; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not so to be wondered at, having had an eleven yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, having been permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the heels it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself; and he that walkes after her at a middle distance, I know not whether I should call that kinde of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them: and I have now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, doe yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and take the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead, and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with mee for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For I protest before the Majesty of God, That I malice no man under the Sunne. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Master: from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks: Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quolibet secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversities hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already, & therefore have not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall privation there is no recession to habit, so it is seldom seen in the privation politike. I do therefore forbear to file my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough, and too much: and it is certaine, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall doe againe. For had it been otherwise, I should hardly have had this leasure, to have made my selfe a foole in print.

THE

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation and preservation of the WORLD.

§. I.
That the invisible God is scene in his Creatures.

§. II.
That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have beene created by God.

§. III.
Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. i. 1.

§. IIII.
Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth,] Gen. i. 1.

§. V.
That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the Word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.
How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.
Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne, and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and use of it: and of motion, and heate annexed unto it.

§. VIII.
Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.
That nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.
Of Fate, and that the Stars have great influence: and that their operation may diversely be prevented or furthered.

§. XII.
Of Prescience.

§. XIII.
Of Providence.

§. XIV.
Of Predestination.

§. XV.
Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.
Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

§. III.
Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof, should yeelde to the immortall soule.

§. IIII.
Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V.
That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

§. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

§. VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the universall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.
That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

§. II.
A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.
That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IIII.
Why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to bee the Fountaine of those foure Rivers.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that sette Paradise under the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlo Syria, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Elay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one streame.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

§. XIII.

Of the river Gehon, & the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Athiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

§. XIII.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.
That the Tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to bee taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

CHAP.

Of the first Booke.

CHAP. V.

Of divers Memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause and revenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.

Of the diversities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they begate their children.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII.

Of the men of Warre before the Flood.

§. VIII.

That the Gyrans, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also divers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were invented: & that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three chiefeest Jupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme, and Judaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously conformed.

Of the last refugees of the Devill, to maintain his Kingdome.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

§. I.

OF Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

§. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

§. III.

Of Deucalions flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Umbrian Italy a remnant of any universall Flood.

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the universall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might have bene foreseene by the starres.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universall Flood: and what are Cataractæ Coeli, Gen. 7. 11.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the fifth

Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

† I.

A Preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

† II.

A proposal of the common opinion, That the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

† III.

The first Argument against the common opinion: They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

† IIII.

The second Argument, That the Eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

† V.

The Third Argument: From the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East-Indies.

† VI.

The fourth Argument: From divers considerations in the person of Noah.

† VII.

Of the Senseless Opinion of Annius, the Commenter upon Berosus, That the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; & yet upon Gordiaei, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

† VIII.

The fifth Argument: The Vine must grow Naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

† X.

An answer to the Objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

† XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers farre higher hills than the Armenian.

† XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

† XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvaile, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a-long, and even in India, be called Ararat.

† XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucaii, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soyle.

† XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of divers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhets portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the sonne of Japhet in Italie; and another of Japhets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. Chap. 38. 39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togorma, of the Posteritie of Japhet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and thence they spread Westward into Europe; and Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.

Of Javan the fourth sonne of Japhet; and of Mesech of Aram, and Mesech of Japhet.

§. VIII.

Of Alcanaz and Rishath, the two Elder sons of Gomer.

Of the foure sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharhis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, & ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

† I.

OF Josephus his Tale of an Aethiopesse, wife to Moses; grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

† II.

A dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

† III.

Chush ill expounded for Aethiopia. Ezechiel 29. 10.

† IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

† V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Aethiopia.

† VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Lera in the Story of Aia, are unadvisedly made Aethiopians.

† VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

† I.

That Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

† II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunnary yeeres, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

† III.

Of certaine vaine asserctions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

† IIII.

Against Pererius, That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

† V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

† VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. v. ult. wherein upon Pererius grounded his opinion.

† VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another sonne of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleven sonnes of Canaan, the fourth son of Ham.

† I.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sons.

† II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

† III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

† IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

† V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

† VI.

Of Zemarai.

† VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the sons of Chush, excepting Nimrod; of whom hereafter.

† I.

That the most of the sons of Chush, were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queene that came to Solomon.

† II.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the West Aethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie chap. 9. v. 7.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

† I.

OF Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

† II.

Of Aram, and his sons.

† III.

Of the division of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sons of Heber, &c.

† IIII.

Of the sons of Jochan, the other son of Heber.

† V.

Of Ophir, one of Jochans sons, and of Peru; and of that voyage of Solomon.

† VI.

Of Havilah the sonne of Jochan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Melha, and Scpher, named in the bordering of the Families of Jochan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the World.

The Contents

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.
OF the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.
Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane Societie.

§. III.
Of the good Government of the first Kings.

§. IIII.
Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.
THat Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Sovereigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have bene of just authority.

§. II.
That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.
That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Eley 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.
Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.
That wee are not to marvell how so many kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.
Of the Name of Belus, and other Names assigned unto it.

§. VII.
Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.
Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have bene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of divers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.
THat Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventor of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.
Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.
That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to bee condemned, though the Devill here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.
That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justify all their practices.

§. V.
The abuse of things, which may be found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right use of them.

§. VI.
Of the divers kindes of unlawfull Magicke.

§. VII.
Of divers waies by which the Devill seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.
That none was ever raised from the dead, by the power of the devill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.
OF the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.
Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.
Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. IIII.

Of the second Booke.

§. IIII.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.
Some of the successours of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the Birth of Abraham.

§. II.
A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.
The answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.
The answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.
The answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that wee may have certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

§. VI.
That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. II. v. 26. doth not prove that hee was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.
A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more unprobable.

§. VIII.
A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.
Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have bene king, lyes betwene Coslojyria, and Arabia Petraea.

§. XI.
Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.
That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.
That it is not unprobable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the countreyes whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the invisible God is scene in his Creatures.

OD, who in the wisest men acknowledge to bee a Power ineffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie invisible; and Understanding which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spiritall, of absolute purenesse and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which He inbraceth, filleth and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet universall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his mercifull provision for all that live, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universall, by the absolute Art of his owne Word, his Power and Almightynesse, which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestiall and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestiall, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Mover.

In these more than wonderfull workes, God (saith * Hugo) speaketh unto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: according to S. * GREGORY, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet. Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job:) which is according to the Fathers, Dominacionem illius conspiciere in vniuersis Creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his Creatures. That God hath bene otherwise scene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Universal: so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not him selfe) was increase and eternall; and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the feat of the infinite power, no more than infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the boue of God (saith BARUCH) how large is the place of his possession! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

Calvinus Gen.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, aswell of all the Heavens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilis, five posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; because it was the seed of the Universal: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and voided, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heavens.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aquae ad secunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulnesse.

Gen. 1.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, & natures exprest; and by the name of Earth and waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moone, and subject to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants, to which the pure and heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proveth, that the drie land was mixt and covered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or feede of the Earth, much lesse of the Universal. Initio in Domine terram fundasti, Thom. O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was covered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by naturall arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire; aire, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Calum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly significth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name so or word the Latines, wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters. And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth feede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good: which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; the works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiades and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid;

Aene Mare, & Terras, & (quod regit omnia) Caelum,

Unus erat tota natura vultus in Orbe,

Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide;

In all the World one only face of Nature did abide:

Which Chaos high, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superse- rebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab avis pulitiei sue incubantibus, quamvis spiritali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Basil. Hieron.

Jesuit.

Some of the Hebrewes convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldaean Paraphrast in this sense. Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflabat: or as other understand the Chaldaean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm.

Psalm. 147. 10.

He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elobim Merachefet, id est, efficaciter motans, convulsos ac agitant super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually & often moving, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the divine goodnesse: Jehi, which is, fiat five, erit, Let it be, or it shall be. Qua vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elobim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quadam divina, agilis ac praeiens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complectens; that is, A certaine divine power or strength every where, active and extending, and stretching through all filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my selfe, I am resolved (Cicero) Deus sit supernaturalis omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirite, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quae Dei sunt, non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esai. 55. 9) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is only knowne to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capiat: For, how God? saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquitie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis aeternae, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave forme to the Matter of the Univerfall, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe Foord, wil presume to passe over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sunne, and enjoy his light, as long as we see looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selves safely, while we stand neere the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDULA, Pris causa efficiens, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tennem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATUS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timeo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world; and in his first Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non meatum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde sayleth, my voyce is silent, and not mine only, but even the voyce Angels: so may all men else be in the understanding, and utterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another; by which hee can, Sed substantia illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustainteth, and giveth continuance to the Univerfall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentia esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum destituerent universa; God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

*Principio Cælum ac Terras, camposq; liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Luna, Titaniaq; astra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insuſa per artus,
Mens agit at molem, & magnose corpore miscet.*

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,

A Spirit within maintains: and their whole masse,
A Mind, which through each part insuſ'd doth passe,
Fashions, and workes, and wholly doth transpiree
All this great Body of the Univerſe.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Univerfall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith JOB. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heate and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter than the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanous, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpiree: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo insitam, ex qua aquæ non solum motum, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. Hee calleth it, A vitall Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and distinctly of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and beate annexed unto it.

THese waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heaven, were also made for signes, & for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or forsmall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fifth Verse; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a civill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, quæ est the cause that things are lightsome (though it make by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Ether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our aire. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conductor, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of flight. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherēt, or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heate, which it transporeth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abest lumine resider in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Platonius and all the Academicks make incorporall, & so doth MONTANIUS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium, Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other CrySTALLINE matter; & whereas it is withstood by uncleane, and unpure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to invade than the former, the same is, Quod obſtaculum naturæ terrenæ aq; ſordidæ, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obſtacle by nature earthy and ſoule, doth not receive the pure clearenesse of light: alluding to that most divine Light, which onely shineth on those mindes; which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane uncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I marvaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Tyrannus, and others: so is his owne judgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly sayd, Nihil ſapientia odioſius acuminio nimio, Nothing is more odious to true wiſedome, than too acute ſharpenesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought, brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorpall: Corporall they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies; which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire illighted: incorpall it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers is esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtaine their being of the light; and therefore, if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; & an intentionall Species may be understood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inhaleth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Moses repeateth twice the maine parts of the Universall: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confuted; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: So the Sun although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day, God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should move (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sunne might give light, heate and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to move, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stirre up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seedes of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Præcipius) to command the Light to bee; which by his all-powerfull Word hee approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under mans understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith ESDRAS): And those which inhabit the Heavens, doe only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heaven, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in mundo invisibiles; in mundo visibiles umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible world; in the world visible, but their shadows. For it minnistrerh to it approacheth neereft unto spiritualitie; and if it have any corporallitie, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things scene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it minnistrerh to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it dissipaterh those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discovereth unto us the glorious workes of God, and carryeth up with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvelles, may continually travaile to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicat: It is the Light (saith Saint AMBROSE) that maketh the other parts of the World so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Mundi oculus.*

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beauty, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimities, and purities, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus perfectio non mens est, ar vero mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit: God (saith HERMES in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Massæ and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, relolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illighted: the Earth also by being contiguous, & mixt with waters (participating the same divine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth seede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Cry stalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate above this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius name it) are not the Cry stalline Heavens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magister calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against jectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and forme, than between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain scholasticall distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farr safer to affirme with SAINT AUGUSTINE, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, what soever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soever from whence are the feedes of all formes, and the formes of all feedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiusque generis est, cuiusque estimationis est, quosunt semina formarum, forma seminum, motus seminum atque formarum. And thus much Auerio is forced to confesse. For all forme (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres have great influence: and that their operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

As, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more generall, and universally powerfull than it is, by giving it Dominion over the minde of man, and over his will, of which Ovid and Juvenal:

*Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
 Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos.*

*Gainst Fate no counsell can prevail.
 Kingdomes to Slaves by Destinie,
 To Captives triumphs given be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Stars are instruments of far greater use, than to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and cold, are not so uncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the basest living creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers: for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as every herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feede them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, than to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his divine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleieve well, and this saying of Syracides withall: I hat there are bid yet greater things than these be, and we have seen but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selves low and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiall bodies. For hardly (saith SALOMON) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before us: who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est de rebus celestibus a liquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destiny; so on the contrary, we doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes depoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were justifiable; of whom S. AUGUSTINE: Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissimi reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem siderum, quam commissorem scelorum. Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they againe with wicked perversesse urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Starres, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionones, & dispositiones: The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions: for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in vertues: for those of cholericke complexion are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites; over all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and piety prepared, putteth himselfe altogether under the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur si fatum si resistas, vincis si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect it, it conquers thee.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne have any power over the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other than as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsius movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith S. AUGUSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, si ministro, non imperio: The Sunne is good to serve, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And Saint AUGUSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora: God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but hee avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoever we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heavens do not alwaies weaken their effects in inferiour bodies no more than the signes of raine and winde doe alwayes come to passe. And it is divers times seene, that paternal vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Juvenis patrum virtus: In the young of spring the Fathers vertue is, and so the contrary patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sonnes of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vices; and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente:

A worthy sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessells will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of vertue first received, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found to exceed vertuous or vicious. Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, than the strength of selfe-nature and kind could have yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a soyle suitable, and like themselves, are made more unfavourable and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adiuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam. A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolemie him- selfe confesseth thus much, Sapientis, & omnia sapientis medici dominabuntur astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevvaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Univerfall, whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Lawes. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other than a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to rike that power and liberty from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enjoy; God beie gmercy, goodnesse, and charity it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth cooperation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayer and Desires may not make frustrate and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himselfe should in a kinde have shut up himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AUGUSTINE) left altogether without hope!

And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so beleeveth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be despoyled of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the worke which thou gavest mee to doe;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his mercifull nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subject our soules to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something lesse than their due: and therefore as I doe not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe them them the same dominion over our immortall soules, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes clarity, and that of the Starres, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predestination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

Prescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things; before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other than an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience only) is not the cause of any thing futurly succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Harvest; and that according to the severall seeds that we sow, we shall reap severall sorts of graine; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne natures. And againe out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & pena malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evill.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greekes call Providia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every-where teach us; Isaies in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure us hereof: and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: so yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever though death therein do manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall neede to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with cloudes, and prepareth braine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow upon the Mountaines, which giveth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drinke of the River Chereth (saith God to Ezra) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they saw not, nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the hayres of your head are numbered: And S. PETER, Cast all your care on him, for hee careth for you: And his judgements are written, saith DAVID.

God therefore, who is every-where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous, and his countenance against them that doe evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; & cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo. I will not give my glory to any other. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every-where present, and King of kings. The example of Gods universall Providence is seene in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all livings for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universall: and if there be a naturall loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universa machine fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and linke or chaine of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part there: of, and the Basis and foundation of the universall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to every-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIV. Of Predestination.

NOW for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Preficiency, than in this, that Preficiency onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth³⁰ and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven, to the unworthiest Wormes of the Earth: and Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines, or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity: divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, & two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, que predestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for ever with God, but the other is to undergoe everlasting torment with the Devil: for according to Nonius MARCELLUS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Dancus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AUGUSTINE, Oculi a se esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

Firstly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subseqent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Starres have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CUSANUS, Divini praecepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CUSANUS, Divini praecepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kinde of Idolatry, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greekes call her tyche, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, refuting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous; in somuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which PALLADIUS, Vita hominum ludus fortuna est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equall successe to those by the best judgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same externall figure with Sapience; wherof Athenians:

Longisimè à Sapientia Fors distidet, Sed multa perficit sament similitudo:

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successe of humane actions, and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non praeceperit; Nothing ever came to passe under the Sunne, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smiteth a man, and he dye, shall dye the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither hee shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helve, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academics, to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, governing every being as well in heavens as earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare unto us no certaine causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith hee) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one & the same differentiated by divers termes, according as we use, & exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depended upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernell : and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their lives in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live : for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and loving truth ; if Princes, or those that governe, endure no other discourse than their owne flatteries, then I say such one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheele ; which kinde of deservng well and receiving ill, we alwayes fillly charge Fortune withall. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not just ; the Generall of an Army, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire ; shall never be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity ; but he must al change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities ; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth : Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course ? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are vertues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur ; Every foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause : so as whosoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate ; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liveth : for such a one is often the author of his owne misery ; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishops of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heresie raged :

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed judgement) had followed the counsell of his brother Quintus Potissus (saith Petrarch) in seculo suo mori, potuisset integro cadavere sepeliri ; He might then have dyed the death of nature, and bene with an untorne and undiscovered body buried ; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth : Quid stultius quam desperantem (praesertim de effectū) litibus perpetuis implicari ? What more foolish than for him that despaires (especially of the effect) to be entangled with endlesse contentions ? Whosoever therefore will set before him *MACHIAVEL*s two marks to shoote at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a backe of yron to a weake wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble : for as he that first deviled to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne invention : so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the divers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes and his cloth of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out : let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God ; the Father of whom are all things, and we in him ; and one Lord Jesus Christ by whom are all things, and we by him ; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeness. Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to us knowne : ingenium mirabilem homo ; Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCURIUS) Natura ardenti ; similis artificum ; The artificiall worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency external, but in respect of his internall forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof : in nature, because it hath an essence, immortall, and spiritual ; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth ; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy than the rest, and understanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before :
So man began to be.

In locum Ovid, Met. l. 1. 76.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers : Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome Ambrose, and some others : which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, ut sicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terrae : Thus as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth : Therefore bee being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse ; that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is invisible, so the soule of man is invisible ; as God is immortall and incorporeall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporeall ; and as there is but one God which governeth the world ; so but one soule which governeth the body of man ; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in every part of the body : Animae est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte ; The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof ; according to Aristotle, though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine ; which that it is otherwise than potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments doe the Jewes (make saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially ; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will ; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde : so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, the holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude divers ; and againe, they distinguish betweene Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threads, with subtilie distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sincerity of the Scriptures : their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to bee substantiall, but not the

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BUt Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is Forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi; the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio, whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth, and therefore it is also called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa. A divine understanding, and an intellect or minde contemplative. Et autem mens nostra (saith Cusanus) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, even the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (in his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) than the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or understanding (saith Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (saith he) which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the divine light, but a body illuminated, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or understanding in men, nor of the essence of Gods infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our soules the purest; or the lumen animarum rationalium, by the true and eternal light illuminated. And this Mens others call animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapientie and divine knowledge, quam amore sapientia sanguinem sequitur Which followeth it.

after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, betwene which and the minde, called anima, betwene which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; animus, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or the Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life. for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or minde, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basilagreeth, which called this Mens, or divine understanding, perspicacia anima pariem, the perceiving part of the minde, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that sleeps it is this (mens) or understanding, and not the mind or soule, which refresheth, during which time it is but habituall in wise men, & in mad men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe live, though distracted.

Therefore this word being oftentimes for the Soule giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Mind) we use also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest minde, or a man of a just minde: sometimes for affection, as, I doe this for my mindes sake; and Anima sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; A part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be diversified, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCURIUS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti praeest, mens anima, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giveth life) is the Image of this understanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or understanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the Soule, and this Soule over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marfilins Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortality laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words: for (saith he) *Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intuat, & ex quo intellectio nem concipiat: hoc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra adphantasiam prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the minde of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a mean, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasmes, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporall Organum: neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblances of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and minde, as colours are to the sight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it selfe is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the minde in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M.D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, wee must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it selfe by which we live, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that we are made after the Image of God. But most fairly may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betwene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betwene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which,* being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint Augustine) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The Minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it selfe, but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentie affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but sinne hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unsuitable by drawing our minds into corrupti concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these joynted, by any of which or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the Minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the scale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which joynted to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the imitable habiliaty of his own Piety, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they feare, love and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and doe not bruise and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstatine finnes. For the unjust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Justice it selfe; The bloud-thirsty hath it not; for God is Charity, and Mercy it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathans, and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood betwene pure light and blacke darknesse, betwene beauty and deformity, or betwene righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodness, which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and duresse pleasures of this Stage-play World, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of Gods Wife-dome, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and termlesse Joy, prepared for those, which retain the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousnesse, and Holinesse, as saith Saint Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose joyneth, that by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sin.

But what examples have ever moved us ? what persuasions reformed us ? or what threatnings made us afraid ? we behold other mens Tragedies playd before us, we heare what is promised and threatned : but the Worlds bright glory hath put out our eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (which which we only see) doe neither looke up towards termelesse joyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till we neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marins Victor.

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, usq; periculis
Tentati, nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitis nullo culparum fine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him; casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to come, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustra sperant qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur. They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

Q.IV:

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carrosse God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soule: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spiritual and incorruptible; nor that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as hee breatheth his grace daily into such as love and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHU in JOB 33. 4) hath made mee, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In quaescentia (saith RABANUS) *uitanda est pauperis sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & spiraculum vitæ habere. Nam et Prophetæ cum ait, Manus uas fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (ad est) juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith hee) the beggarliness of carnall sense is to bee avoided, lest perhaps wee should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with his awes or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands have made mee, spake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate, and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith JOB; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God: that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the soule; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, And Jesus receive my spirit; and in S. JOHN, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortal soule of man differeth from the Soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gave it.*

6. Y.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Univerfall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which hee might contemplate and serve his Creatour, after whose image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also hee might governe and rule the World; and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelicall; Rationall; and Brutall; giving to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature; he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts; and the proper rationall belonging unto man: and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENES) Homoe est utriusq; naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Univerfall, and (by allusion) a kinde of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum.

dum in brevi magnum, atq; exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heave and lumpish: the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Inde genus durum sumus, experientq; laborum, Et documenta damus, qua finis origine nati:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approving, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brookes and Rivers over all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which, stirred up by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth. Our radi- call moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintai- ned) is resembled to the fat and fertilitye of the Earth; the haire of mans body, which adorne or over-shadows it, to the grasse, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determi- nations, to the light, wandering & unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds, our eyes, to the light of the Sun and Moone; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat, dry up, and wither away, or the fierce puffs of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our minde, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (former- ly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh upwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne Image and simili- tude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehen- a est iustitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the universall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complections resemble the foure Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets: Whereof our infancie is compared to the Moone, in which we seeme onely to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instru- cted; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Love, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts travaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we beginne to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and over-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can never be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sick- nesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unsociable to others, we become aburthen to our selves: being of no other use, than to hold the riches we have, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on unto, with many sighes, groanes and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workman- ship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we al- waies travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of ho- nor and riches any power at all, to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of eter- nity; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death; whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but never floweth againe: our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more,

neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne us againe, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

*Redditur arboribus florens revirentibus arvis;
Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.*

To which I give this sense;

The Planis and Trees made poore and old
By Winter envious,
The Spring-time bounteous
Covers againe from shame and cold:

But never man repair'd againe
His youth and beaume lost,
Though Art, and care, and cost,
Doe promise Natures helpe in vaine.

And of which,

CATULLUS EPIGRAM. 53.

Soles occidere & redire possunt:

The Sunne may set and rise:

But we contrariwise

Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux, Nox est perpetua una dormienda.
Sleepe after our short light
One everlasting night.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be main- tained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall living things, and as the sap and juice, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THESE be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberrall choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himselfe, to bee his owne Guide, his owne Workman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe unto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith STRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsell. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other crea- tures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change, and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sen- sible of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which so- ever he tooke pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should suturely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Aibe- nensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamor- phoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens con- ditions, from Reason to Brutalitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensualitie; by Wolves, ravening, and greedie Men; which also Saint Matthew resembleth to false prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but in- wardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of Stones and stockes, foolish and igno- rant Men; by Vipers, ungratfull Men: of which S. JOHN BAPTIST, O ye generation of

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Univerſall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that hee left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worke to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but God rested (that is) hee created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their feeds in themselves; to the fourth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but hee gave to all things which hee had created the name of good, thereby to reach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the Place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

Concerning the first Habitation of man, we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee made; GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgements have bene in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote; and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne judgements, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof bee not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obſervant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeveth in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum autoritate perſuasi, transmittimus; Wee passe over many grosse errors, by the authority of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wile from the understanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confesse that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur? (saith Job) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakes; and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our salvation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired; whether there were a Paradise, or no: or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, and allegoricall: as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers, Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other myteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinall virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Hony. This Allegoricall understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was againe by Francisus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis); whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fifth Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the minde, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. hein direct words alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus is of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing, To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two severall places. First, upon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 1. 10. Of which he giveth this judgement: Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissimi docet, in tam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut turn erat) fructibus consistam, sedem & horum illum Ade, & posteritatis suae fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, doth clearly shew, that the Univerſall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terra: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goroſius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion; but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goroſius findeth neere the River of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonaventura, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctiall; and Foſtellus, quite contrary, under the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, & all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Ayre: Strabus, Rab.

Rabauus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Judæus, that hee wonderd, Quomodo genio afflatus: By what euill Angell he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly marvell at the learned men, who so grossely and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the kingdomes and provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Iudæa, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueveth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Rivers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

S. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee had made. And howsoever the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantauit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning, putting the word 'pleasure' for Eden, & (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that hee planted a garden in pleasure, or that a River went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldaean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Nounne appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertilitye of the soyle, of the many beautifull Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwayes keepe their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrey, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrey, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof: so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacy, for its pleasure, or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth flourishing, so Eden signifieth pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countreies; for Eden being the proper name of a Region, called pleasure in the Hebrew, and Paradise being the choice state of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham and Chimchi: and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascentus &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damascentus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confectus: Paradise is a place, marvellously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both understand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrary to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis, Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo confectum in regione terra Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quærenti capite Gen. ubi legitur Cham habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden: For Moses (saith (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrey, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERRINUS endeavoureth to qualifie this translation; for this particule (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Diuell was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better judgement) the Devill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (an) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden, Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin, and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin, He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. BECANUS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But BECANUS followeth this construction, only to the end, to finde Paradise upon the River of Acefines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascentus:) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out: and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, alwayes towards the West, thereby to avoide the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudæa, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall wee have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, and the Kingdome of heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mysterie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudæa and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ovid.

Eurus ad Euvoram, Nabatæaq; regnare cessit.
Persidaq; & radiis juga subdit amantinis.

The East winde with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian, and the Persian Hills, Whom Pegasus first salutes at his up-rising.

And if be objected, that Hieremy the Prophet, threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he cleareth the word, From the beginning that is from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward hee affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning & Eastward is all one; à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it and keepe keeps it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countie neere unto Charan in Melopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountaine, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river, as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon DANIEL: Contestant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam constantem evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoria Legis se debere subverti. Let the doctrine of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, & the Trees under the Rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free libertie to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heaven, nor neere the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, viewed him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inventions, and that if he had not described both the region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites & others after them, would have misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likewise, there would have beene too often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Utopia? For wee finde that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural finne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Soar: In like manner was Israell resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians waited it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a feare and soyle of farre exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the story of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Per erat æternum placidæque repensibus arvis Mulsabant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyfull Spring did ever last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breed | Without the helpe of Seed

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sects Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had bin conceived out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if wee finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Havila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligunt; alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum; id est Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt. (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth thus allowable judgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimi nemus sensibilis simul & intelligibilis, & duplici specie est præditus (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both waies, and endued with a double forme.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intrude diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kinde of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proved, for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judæa, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Rivers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Saviour, were said to have beene in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender roote in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgement of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwife for their doctrine in generally, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe and separated as to hang in the Ayre under the circle of the Moone; or who so foolish to conceive, that from thence the foure Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall downe, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up againe in his habitable world; and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man thinke that I enforce or strain to the work, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est autem locus amantissimus, longo terra & maris tractu a nostra habitabilis Zona secretus, adeo elevatus, ut usque lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so that it reacheth to the globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Bare converted by Masius.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turne upside downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when NOAH sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive-leaf in her mouth, which she had pluckt, and which (untill the Trees were discovered) the found not: for the otherwise she might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne up by the rootes, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written, folium Olive, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Rivers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universallitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the AEI's, and habb made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way prove such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of blood originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth; yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choyce, but that Adam had bin left to the Universall; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God bene left to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Universall had bene Paradise: for then must Adam have beene chased also out of the World. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleewe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Universall, there should grow but one Thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean bee taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could bee no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havilah in India, & Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, & Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture farre more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which hee was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Flood, yet Adams thin-bones must have contained a thousand sadome, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

THardly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus: and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neereft heaven; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) tooke this place for Heaven it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Arcopagites (in this and many other divine apprehensions) set downe what they beleaved in plain termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Devill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Ensebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, upon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothomos) which being above all Clouds of Raine, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeeres) are called Macrobi (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proove of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last judgement; which Irenaeus and Justine Martyr also beleaved. But this opinion was of all Catholicke Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgement: Sicut certum est, ENOCH et ELIAS nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now live: so where they live, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is uncertaine. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the earth, and have risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames have bene answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventer.

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being far so neere the Moone, it had bene too neere the Sunne, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have bene too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Ayre in that Region is so violently moved, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the place betwene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolomee and Alfraganus) is seventene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a grosse account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compasse of the whole earth for a basis and foundation. But had it bene so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive us of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwell neere the Catadupa, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I have seene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrosio together: to which Peterius, Sed ego hac apud Basilum & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quae nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrosio.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For al- though flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the earth, saving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but be- lieved that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits above all Mountaines, that the Flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other latter Schoole-men also beleeved; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelme it:) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountaines under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell give credit to Mafius, Damasceus, & the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith, That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas quali- fieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleeved, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to assume in words, but by Hyperbole and com- paratively, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better reach all their Followers to shift, than to resolve by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence waite off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous, and Pliny himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is farre under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise under the Aequinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Those which come neerer unto Reason, finde Paradise under the Aequinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the foure rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Countrey, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat: It was therefore a reason- able conjecture; that those Countreies which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed unin- habitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For heroe experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witness of mens travailes, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith I say) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated under the Aequinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brisce) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne cannot so much murther it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe have seene, neere the Line and under it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equal temper: Onely there are some tracks, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts with- out trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Re- gions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bea- ring, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both Greene and ripe; as may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any time despise her withered Husband Vernumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countreies called Terra vitiosa, Vicious Countreies: for Nature being liberrall to all without labour, needesse imposing no industrie or travell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole- men were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Chelofria, there is a Coun- try in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Esai. 37. and Ezek. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those ima- ginary worlds, nor under Torrída Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historian and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they trans- forme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguish all things; the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subjected and intrinseled

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to finde the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judaea; and that it was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judaea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as infertility could not runne out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, & the rivers only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsakeh: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar, and in Ezechiel, where he propheth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Albur, and Chilmad, were they merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapoliitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Corvallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is joyned to Arabia the Desert, & where Ptolomie placeth the City of Averia: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Calosyria, otherwise Vallis carva, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Province lye East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Jewes beleeveth this Calosyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beza, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beza his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other late Writers, saying, That he sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith Esaiah) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Albur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezechiel) the Mart of all the people for many Isles. And it hath ever bene the custome, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Countrey yielded: and having counted the severall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exported: They were they merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broyered workes, fine linnen, corall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba, & Raamah were they merchants, they occupied in they Fautes, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia & Arabia Felix yeelded: and because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countreys yeilded:

and (withall) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entered by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonosor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three dayes journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited farr up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Selenus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated downe low upon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I meane on the East-side of Tigris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenita upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the City of Thapfacus, where Ptolomy appointed the Foorde of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenita by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam emittibus, iter est per Schenitas, The Merchants which travaile from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldaea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it selfe, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran, & Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Albur and Chilmad were they merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a country betwene rivers: for Mesori in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Calosyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenita, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, & the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the uninhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesseth Appian), and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite unto it; where these rivers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to joyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is uncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seate thereof, that so many other cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betwene Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Jews Judges scated, as, by Charan or Heran in Mesopotamia; also by Caaneh and Rejeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem Jehovah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Iusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiae & Mesopotamiae; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden, and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemeth by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia; which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, & Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may have some farther light for the proove of that, which they have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Goçoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doublet) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldaea. This Island of Eden hath upon the River, and not farre beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosfal or Mosfel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mosfal or Mosfel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher up Tigris, in these words. Juxta autem Tigrim, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mosel dicitur, magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta nere unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosfel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mosfal (or Mozal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated upon Tigris, and in the neighbourhood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Selencia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur, in these words: Ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Civitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Nineves; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Selencia) for Selencia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neerer the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Mosfal, & that ancient City, which Protolmy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philostratus, and Simon Sethi, Mosula, and John Lean, Mosfal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mosfal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tigris, nere Mosfal: so that we are like to finde this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mosfal, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tigris.

The onely difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more unprobable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world have bene, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tigris between Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Ethicus, Disciple of Gallenicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaeus called Istiri, who lived in Egypt in the Reigne of Phisadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Ethicus. For Ethicus makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Aethiopia, calling the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions, (saith Ethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them travell Mesopotamia. Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places, is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Springs. Also STEPHANUS de urbibus, mentioneth the Citie of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celestia. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventie and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: & all men understand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatablus). And because that which I have said of the Ile of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of selfe-invention, I have hereunder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tigris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance unto such an Election as themselves had made: having three hundred years before that upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had bene of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle. Verum nos non acceptavimus neq; proclamavimus ipsum, sed subito convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis quae sunt circum Civitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineves, ex Babylonia, ex Charræ, ex Arbella, ex Insula quae est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauri Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Nineve, & out of Babylonia, Charræ, Arbella, and out of the Island which lieth in the middle of Ti-gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they use these words: Neq; superflui apud nos Metropolitae, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci, Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adurbeigan; en vestigio convenimus in Insulam, qua est, intra Tigris flumen, Eden, fecimusq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but so we assembled speedily in the land Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selves, &c.

Now this land of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in ibam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, qua duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosai positae, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & apancis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which land is situated about twelve miles above Mosai, containing very neere ten miles in compass, and every 20 where environed with a wall, inhabited by few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hofan-ceptra, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impostam; Above the aforesaid land of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this land of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his general Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petras, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the ascription of the said Prophet, & joynd with those Nations of Reseph, Cameth, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the paring of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Rivers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one streame.

BUt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plurall; which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explanatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erit egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, A River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tigrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus: Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbes and Trees; and againe, We cate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; in medio ligni Paradisi; in the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees:) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vasabius, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for nunquodq; illorum, and he giveth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous Countreies. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have bene,) divides it selfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable passages into severall Countreies, though not all the way downe the streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countreies named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countreies (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris under Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Sufiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nahar-fares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas; both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ramus; by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldaea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper streame of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tigris) above Selucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon & Otris. But, be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tigris is the River of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe City was Nineve, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineve, which was the chiefe City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first streame. Caput aqua (saith ALPIANUS) illud est, unde aqua nascitur, sive fonte nascatur, fons, sive ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new bankes, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitye and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

Hord. Cl. 11.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertilitye and beautie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitye and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no more such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Nineve, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region of all that we have seene, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward, Cereis autem fructus procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold. The leaves of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Figge Trees. Thus saith Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree, so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt. Of which the people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antoninus the Eremite findeth a fitt commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kinde of fine Flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Atanasius in the life of Antoninus the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) pascuis per omnem Regionem Palmæ suæ sponte nascentes; There are Palmes over all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læva Arabiæ (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem; accensam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repellit pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (a famous for plenty of sweete odours) there lyeth a Champaine Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to drive their Castell from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bi in anno segentes Babylonii fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeare (saith Niger). And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northerne parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elswhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetuall activity. In briefe, so great is the fertilitye of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them up with Sheepe: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularitye to that soyle, That the second yeare the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeeldeth them a harvest come without any further labour: his words are these, libertatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte refulsibilis fiat seges.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Havilah.

AFTER the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitye thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tigris, or both be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which river or rivers Moses witnesseth afterward divided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two rivers as farre distant as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their owne inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have growne out of the nor-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tigris tooke name from Havilah the sonne of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the sonne of Jochan; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the Flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Rasamah; and the sonnes of Jochan were Ophir, and Havilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the sonnes of Jochan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Havilah adjoining, had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous river of the East India, and Havilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which river is said by Moses to water the land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure rivers named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for neerenesse, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus commeth betwene it and Tigris? and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betwene those two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse than fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whoeover readeth the storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no River in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suassus, Acisines, Adris (otherwise) Hirovis, Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are fwallowed up with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one streame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must some-where be joynt with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceede out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede; out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, in which divides the Northren Scythia from India, & runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Peraib and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gorgiean Mountaines; so as Ganges, who onely travaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never saw the land of Eden, or joynted themselves in one channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into foure heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. 15.

Therefore the River Pifon, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piso-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the sonne of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the Sonne of Joctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bignesse of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Berolius affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Havilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Susiana or Havilah stretcheth it selfe towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Szech.
Heph. de Per.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Eltra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellepont and all Asia the lesse betweene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retainne some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other under the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these Rivers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandus, as by Pestellus; by Castaldus; of Baldach: by Barinus, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all those that have lately seene it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pifon, Ptolemie indeede with many others give the name of Baslinus or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mabar-sares, and Marsias, and Barsars. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Junius, Packperab, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parab, (saith Ar. Montanus): Pagninus, Peraib; Josephus, Phorab; Eusebius, Zozimus; Amnianus, Chalymicus; Gi-stilanus, and Colimetius terme it, Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genes conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (saith he) streame into foure branches; two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason, why these two rivers joynted in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Piso-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea not farre from Ur, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris, accompanied with Pifon, doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was first broched by Josephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was transported into the East India, to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side; and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to worke wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of rivers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first fate downe with his sonnes Shebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pifon compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Joctan, Ophir, and Havilah, leated themselves as neere together as they could in India, so did the sons of Cush in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah or Chavilah was first Chuse of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susana.

From this Havilah unto the Delarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possesse all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: and which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red Sea. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red Sea, to Havilah in the East India; for Saul was no such travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrie Saul wasted: for Amalec and the Amalekites posselt that necke of Countrie, betweene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia Felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or backside of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petraea and Deserta.

§. XIII.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush. CHRON. 21. 16.

NOW, as Havilah in the East India drew Pifon so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventie translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was citemed for Nilus. But Ethiopiens are, as much as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countrie called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopiens, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopiens are very neere, or else directly under the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and the West; and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Cush Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Chush and the land of the Chusites be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Israhel ab Havilah usque Sur, quæ respicit Egyptum.

Egyptum introeuntibus Assyrios; Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from the way of Assyria, or the Countrey bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zearah the Chusites, which others call Tharantia, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had bin a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having to mightie a King as the King of Egypt, betwene Parastina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victory tooke some of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disproving it: And Abraham departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betwene Cadeth and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar. Now Sur is that part, upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene wearie, and unable to resist. Again, in the story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore Isaac went to Bimelech, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure Bimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse save his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homer's East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elswhere: For Plinie in his fift Eooke and eight Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that, which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, under Prefter John; And the West Æthiopia is that, which joyneth it selfe with the River Niger, which we call Senega & Gambra: for thereabout are these Æthiopians called Perorhi, Daratites, with divers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prefter John, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he served Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie: And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith Pererius, professing Hebrew to be not the voice of Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which significeth blacke, and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopian, as (with Iosephus) the Geneva converts it, though it helpe it a litle with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Arabia Petrea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus; that Moses fled from Pharao into the Land of Madian, and sat downe by a Well, &c. and againe in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheepe of Jethro his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeede, these four nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Potiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginall note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion; he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery, and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Potiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites; which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more mainfest, it is written in the first of Judges, That when Israel had sowne, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came upon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that every man would give him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. sheeles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings; because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of warre. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum. His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenita. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) use poyson upon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierom reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now how farre it is off betweene the Philistines and the Negro's or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe and joine with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Desert of Sur and Pharan, are betweene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have bene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistins, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which joyneth to Arabia.

Now, may we thinke, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could beignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a River of Egypt, where in he was borne and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had beene a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had devided them: for they had lived there all dayes of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in steed of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Isay, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affaires with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Coelosyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast (as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel) from the dayes of Moses, even unto the time of David by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Mos. Beroldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus; so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and never looked backe to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe, with his sonnes, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Havilah, (now Susiana): Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the River, in the entrance of Arabia felix. Nimrod seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldaea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Ethiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them: in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which

which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have beene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalnes; yet we find, that his Successors within a few yeeres after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire, founded by Nimrod a younger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts untill they crept further off, and in places not yet intituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to joyne themselves (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with judgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall finde, that every Family feared themselves as neare together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, fate downe in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayed; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increace. The first Father of Men Adam, had therein his former habitation: The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as afore-said) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleaned and enriched; so did Havilah place himselfe upon Piso. Tigris: Raamah and his sonne Sheba farther downe upon the same River, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they always fastned themselves to the Rivers sides: for Nimrod, Charran, Reseph, Canech, Ur in Chaldaea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

But now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluviorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Equinotiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For whereinsoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they have excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefites the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison betwene one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Univerfall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, above the middle Region of the Ayre: some, elevated neere the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Aire, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Judaea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe joyne in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie; and this river is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges above foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Meditteran Sea: and Euphrates distillerh out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I have added a Chorographick description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, untill such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

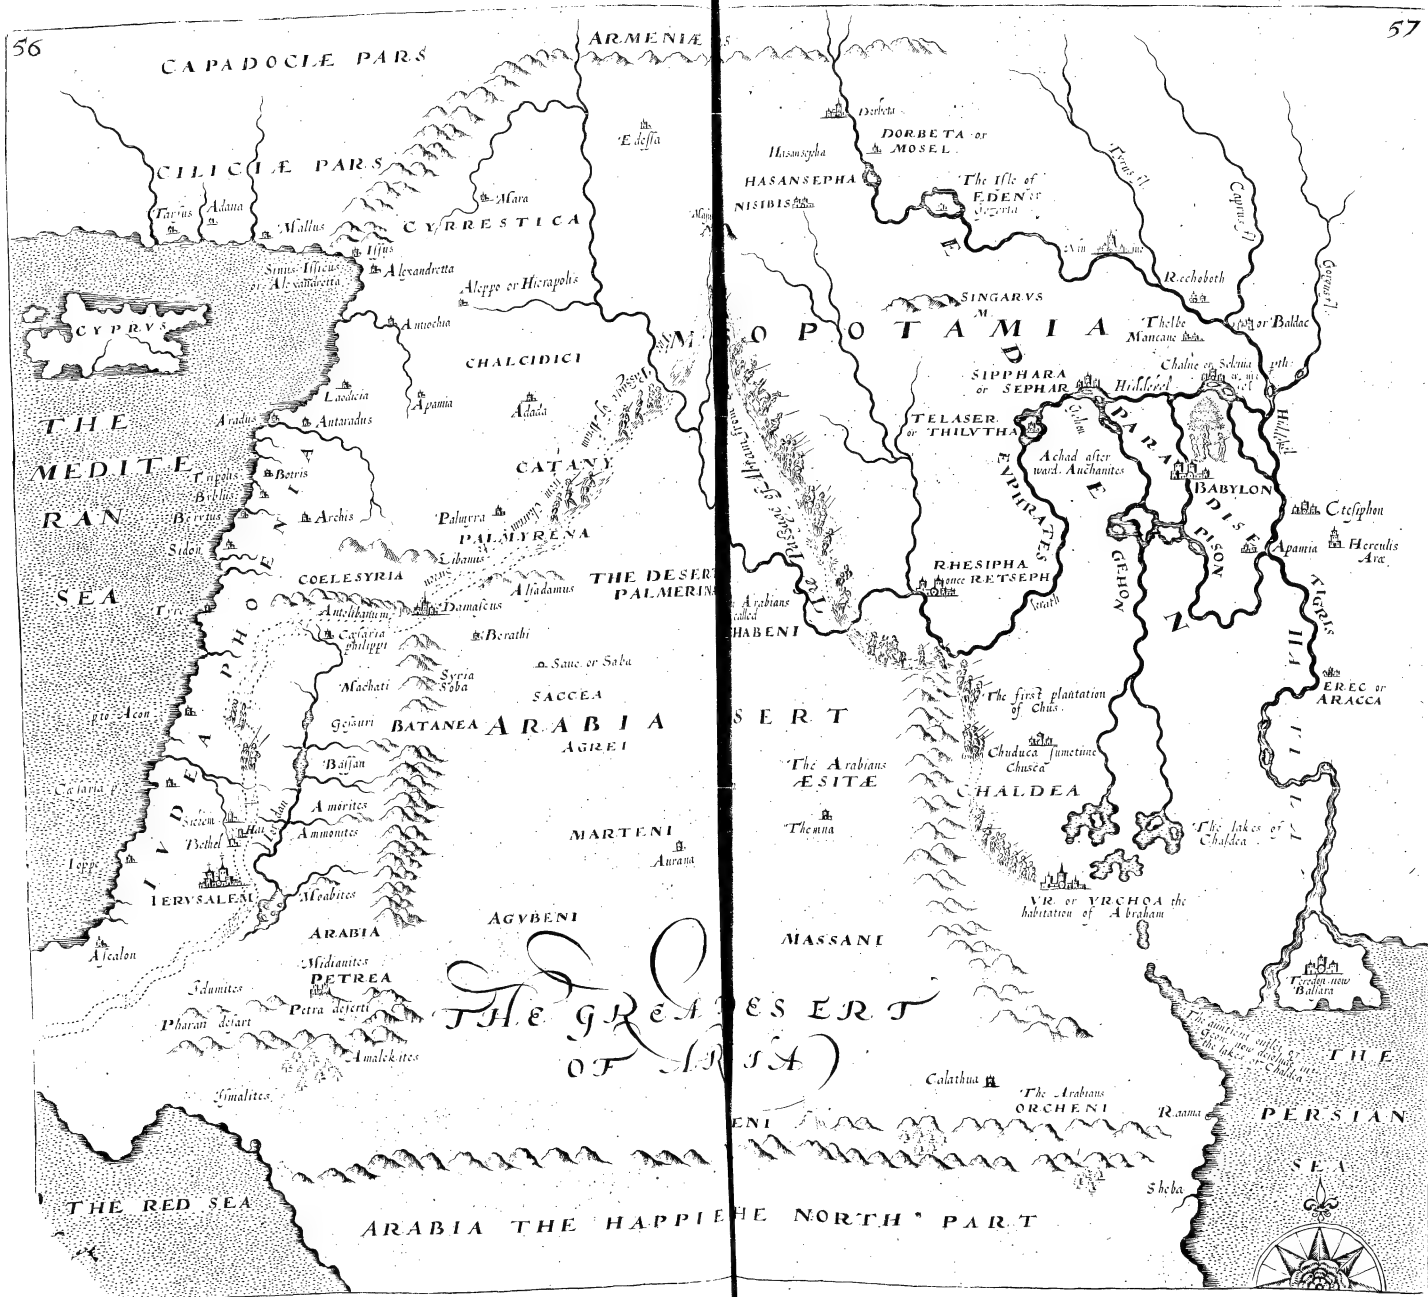

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

OR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, & ratioll life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also given a duresfull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures,

Man

Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, healthfull, and ungreiv'd life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have bin translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeares; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeares and upwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobey'd Gods first and easie Commandement, the lives of men on Earth might have continued double, treble; or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of soules must have bin ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenish'd, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chrysostome must be understood of immortalitie of bodies, which should have bin translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; and out of the Apocalypsis. I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of Life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth every Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others, so from the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

of BECANUS his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evill, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himselfe the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever ghesse at, whereto Goropius much marvelleth. But as he had an inventive braine, so there never lived any man, that beleev'd better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above fixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne; and Bar-Cephas himselfe referreth the invention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Abaturgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beleefe. For Moses Bar-Cephas in this Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acefinis, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleete of Gallies, in or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) some what bigger; and that it is a tree, sempiterna; alwaies planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horfemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onesicritus sayeth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bignesse, which also Plinie & Onesicritus confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speake by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the river Acefines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my selfe have seene twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not farr from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, 10 some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the utmost end of the head branches thereof, such out a gummy juyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughes of these young Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one year and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) throwd foure hundred or foure thousand Horfemen, if they please; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe over the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote under water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cordes out of the Sea, I have seene five hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never finde, and yet I have travailed a dozen miles together under them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, this Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleeveth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other tree (saith he) could containe them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among tenthousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves, which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run up & downe the Garden to seeke out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaves of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse; which Plinie avoweth in these words, Latitudo foliorum pelta effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of Amazonian shield: which also Theophrastus confirmeth; the some of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazonidum lunatæ agmina peltæ
PENTHESILAEAE furens.
The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAEAE leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleevd, or rather threatneth us all that reade him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: Quærit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de sicu hac æ antiquis scriptoribus cum MOÏSIS narratione compareret, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadraret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of MOÏSES, as to dare to avow, that any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth never brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his owne belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: only thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God given to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience.

§. III.

Of BECANUS his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BUt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and upright towards God; until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like unto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding unbragiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of justice being not able to pierce, wee have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruite which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little vertue, and unperceived knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweeter, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughes of this Tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather sitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing stateliness, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and heheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaves to cover himselfe withall: this may serve to put us in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorne our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, we use so many uncharitable and cruell practises in this world.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the storie of ADAMS sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-Cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (ide est) experientia boni & mali ab eventu; The Tree of knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men living, have growne up; and having received immortalitye from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandment was the fearefullest evill, and the observance of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sicknesse is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering & experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet self by the prooffe thereof in himselfe, another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods judgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Efk, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heape of Stones called the heape of witness, betweene Jacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Viventis, & videmis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing persuasions, unawares; his profection being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poison mankind in the very root, which he moistned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for ever.

But what meanes did the Divell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife &c. (saith God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all the life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted, even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts, into whom the Divell entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience: even a desire to know what was most unfitting her knowledge; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yeeld to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of David, Gods chosen servant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have bene allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices, by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeite passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things betweene the fall of ADAM, and the Flood of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of CAIN's sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himselfe the first Murtherer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giveth a reason; for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have bene in taking away the lives of men onely, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exit facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAIN's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others understand to signifie wandering or uncertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, justly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And who so ever findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather fought to fortifie himselfe against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Jewes after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jewes had never since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare HENOCHE, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne HENOCHE. And to HENOCHE was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat METHUJAEI, and METHUJAEI begat METHUSAEI, and METHUSAEI LAMECH.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth fare otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807. yeare, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so as all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeares, and he dyed: as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

|---|--------------------|---|---|----|---------------------|
| 2 | Cain. | 7 | Lamech , who by Seth . | 7 | Henoch : |
| 3 | Henoch : | | Ada had | 8 | Methusalem . |
| 4 | Irada . | 8 | Jubal & Tubal , & Cainan . | 9 | Lamech , and |
| 5 | Methujael . | | by Silla , Tubal . | 10 | Noah . |
| 6 | Methusael . | | cain , and Noëma . | | |

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josaphat giveth unto Lamech threecore and seventene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada and Silla: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Invention of Pastorage, of Musique, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Heards and Doves: Tubal invented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanically, the third given to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seventy yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and five yeares, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162. yeares old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threecore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Methusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, & which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we finde Mahaleel to be begotten by Cenan at threecore and ten yeares, who was the first Sonne of Cenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other sonnes of Methusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

Saint

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger sonne of Jessai; and lastly, we finde, that the kingdom of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

The third Objection is, that the great difference of yeares betwene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well nere seene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing, that soone after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those yeares were but Lunary yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the year of his life an hundred and five; if those yeares be taken but for Moneths, then had Seth lived but eight yeares, and one Moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have bene but six yeares and forty eight weeks old, and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and feed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of Generation at fixe, seven or eight yeares, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the World, and length of dayes and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary yeares, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourecore and ten and odd yeares, which were not only lesse by farre than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourecore, and some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seventeen and an halfe of our yeares.

And if wee seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable; that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there mult of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much lesse corrupt, which yeelded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the Curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Planets, Herbes, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sunne have one time of strength, and another of weakenesse, a youth and beautie, and then age and deformity: so time it selfe (under the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worne out that lively vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and clement matter, shall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the old age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time: the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an unnaturall curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to finde out Nurfes, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender yeares, wherein Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe feedes (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and waxe old even in their Infancy. But above all things the exceeding luxuriouseffe of this gluttonous Age, wherein we presse Nature with over-weighty burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Phaësa.

— O prodiga rerum
Luxuries nunquam parvo contenta paratis:
Et questorum terra pelagorum ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & laeta gloria mensæ.

O wastfull Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent:
Vaine glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouse,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirst is served:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not starved.

Dier. Hierogl. 1.

The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty yeares, and Berosus to a hundred and seventene yeares. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) foure and fifty persons of an hundred yeares of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten; two of an hundred and five; and twenty: foure, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred & five & thirty, or a hundred and seven and thirty yeares old: & last of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

7. Com. l. 13. c. 8.
Plin. l. 7. c. 8.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Esäans gave them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Peritans Magicians & Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, & Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia, little lesse: Also Masaniß of Numidia lived very long, & Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them live full two hundred yeares; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: & that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe, as Matthion, Berosus, Mochus, Elstius, Hieronymus, Aegyptius, Hecataeus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Faine, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Army, who had out-lived three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589. & many yeares since, who was married in Edward the Fourth time, and held her Joynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witnesse: Strozzius Cicagius, out of Torquemada Massæus, and the like Authors, tellerh of some that have not onely far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference betwene the ability of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Conitellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Ayre, and temperate use of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long upright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in every instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heave load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayre, and a temperate use of those things which nature wanteth, are the onely friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had beene, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise mento a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine litteris medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdra, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not onely upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem: a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Josuah, and Josuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus; & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; than to give holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jewes was animation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britains, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certaine presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazzards. For; leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himselfe two hundred forty and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse than five hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight yeares old: from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Jude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had scene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gargens, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alleged that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he rejected) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Peterius, that such a Book there was, & that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devill about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonically Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jewes Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seene and might preserve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other prooffe than selfe-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renown before the Flood.

Now let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cain's children: and of Adam by Seth ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh, men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they served and prayed God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling upon the name of the Lord; and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Jared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the birthes of their sonnes, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah, Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others understand this place, (salutem cum Deo) (saith, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) hee dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the piety of Enoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, He was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which S. Paul promitteth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, wee shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories if they had bin preserved, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus preceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards callth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universall, when the children and sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted & misled by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lactantius, and Eusebius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needlesse: the question being incapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine have answered it largely long agoe. For that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God; (that is) always attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also divers in later times.

Of these Giants which Moses callth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intitled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whoever desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatise before named. It is true that Cyriacus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who assume shamelessly, That

That the Giants have in elder times not only cast up Mountaines upon Mountaines, but removed Ilands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making warre with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembered; and even out of this Scripture: That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus. That Giants were the sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine:

*Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes;
Orti quod terra fuerint & sanguine caeli.*

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came;
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opinators and selfe-believing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since, seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative straying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renowne, (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not beene found among divers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all the famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe clearly and without all allegorical construction avow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Josuah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Aferoth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for giants as the Anakims. Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon he useth these words: That alsona taken for a land of Giants; for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Aferoth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer king of Elam overthrow, assisted by other kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonies men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, king of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, four hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sons of ANAK, which come of the Giants; so that we seemed in our sightes like Grasse-hoppers; and so we were in their sight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne judgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: inso much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures, put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed five thousand shekles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weavers beame, and his speare-head weighed six hundred shekles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath.

of another Goliath, surnamed Gethu, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants, of which the first was slain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, even foure & twenty.

Also that Sampson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after flue thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Asse: And lastly, he tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgement, that both Nature and the Heavens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeeble and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renowne, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successours, as the ordinary proportion of all men in general, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which S. Augustine thus expoundeth; Neq; enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa praesentia. Sed si non natur Scriptura et alibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut et perseveret superbiens, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quarentes, & alacres intelligentes. God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to doe): but if the Scripture did not use these words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that under stand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

HERE before wee proceeded any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for us to consider how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical sense, wrapping it up mixed with other their owne trumpery; have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes or God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpefull medicines out of poison, as poyson out of the most healthfull hearbs & plants (all things having in themselves both life and death): so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth, find out every-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively exprest.

§. II.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of NOAH;
and in the old Egyptians.

But this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberrall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull quality, as the waters of the generall flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, even among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Gyants of the first Age. Whence the Chal-daens began soone after the Flood to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not only learne to leave the true God, but created twelve severall gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina quos Egyptios in usum habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosque primis Aras, & primos Egyptios in usum habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosque primis Aras, & Imagines, & Tempia Diis sibi erexisse. The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herodotus

§. III

That in proceſſe of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superſtitious of the Egyptians.

But as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, doe then after wander for evermore in vices unknowne, and daily travaile towards their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blinde Idolaters every Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gave divine reverences, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most unworthy and baseſt of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Ataxandrides derideth in this manner:

Na. Emilius
cap. 7.

Bovem colis, ego Deis malto bovem.

Tu maximam Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obſoniorum credidi ſuaviſſimum.

Carnes ſuillas tu carēs, at gaudeo
His maxime: canem colis, quem verbero
Edemem ubi deprehendo forte obſonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.

I broyle th' Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:

You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.

You worship Dogges; to beate them I thinke meet,

When they my store devour.

And in this manner JUVENAL.

Porum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morſu:
O ſanctas gentes, quibus hæc naſcuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root up, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they ſerve with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their owne ſowing
Have ſtore of gods in every Garden growing!

§. IIII.

§. IV.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certaine that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metall remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many pro-phane histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Jupiter was laid to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochites before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove edificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses:
And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochites were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Policus, a Founder of Cities, and Hercules, an incloser or strengthener of Cities (say Phœnicians and Pausa- nius); and that to Jupiter Hercules there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Judeus conceiveth that Cain built sixe others, as, Maich, Jared, Tche, Jseca, Selet, and Ge- bar: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Jabal, Tubal, and Tubal- Cain (inventors of pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musike) the same which were called by the ancient prophane writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noëma or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venus or beautiful, Voluptas or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Ad- am was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eva, Rhea, and Nomia or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Eva: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesper- ides: the prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroës (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars and Heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astrea: of which Ovid:

Ultima cœlestium terras Astrea reliquit.

Astrea last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethnickes would understand Justice it selfe to have fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person, yet as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus; so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by Justice and Ashtas, Enoch; the justice and piety of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah was said to bee a just man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

From this story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men upon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre undertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth.

Tens aere (nifus) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, capereq; Jovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & vicio leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Jove of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any conjunction of the starres, should bury them under the moisture of a second floud, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who when he read the Booke of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

Wee finde also many remembrances of Seib, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successeur Seib, of Seib: and of the same Seib (as many men of good judgement have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seib most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seib, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Province Seibitica. We also find in Bithynia the City of Seibia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Gracians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their owne: and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gave the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefeft Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

BUt of all those amies of Jupiters remembred by the Antients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called because the one had reference to his celestiaall conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire): the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third, of whom all the Græcian fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candie) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of Juvans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifyeth life, but somewhat strained. Boccus in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberall, mercifull, loving, and faithfull (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoever deserved) as the worthyest, that ever were, acquired by their well deservings. Joves omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings Jupiters, as Thucydides in his variabistoria confirmeth; gesolim Joves vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembred Jupiter was borne, it is uncertaine. Somethere are that make him of Crete: others that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Nat.com. l. 2. s. 2. Ops, to bee fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titan's permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might bee interrupted by any of them in their succellion; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is sayned that Saturne devoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Haud sit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter is not knowne,
Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filius. | By being the grave and buriall of his owne.

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybil also witnesseth in these words;

*Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coëgit
Saturnum, de se natumne nutritiulum, Quo possint regnare senis post fata Nepotes.*

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturne swear
No sonne to nourish, which by reigning might Usurpe the right of Titan's lawfull heire.

But Ops the mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysianus) into Crete, as hee did afterwards his two brothers, Nepine and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnosius, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, Enthymion by Crista the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to bee of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme that hee was fed by Honi-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skinnies into yellow; a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes have many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge that Saturne had broken his faith, hee set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter againe rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after hee was once settled and became potent, hee gave himselfe over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others: and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niohe, Laodemia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitruon, by whom hee had Pelagum, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Savina:

Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one story, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt given by Hercules Libicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Iphis, and the cymballs of Basilica, with many petty circumstances, needrely enough resembling each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giving to Uranus or Heaven for daughters, Fate, & Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogy hee adds Elinus or the Sunne, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Jupiter, Batylus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigina, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The pedigree of them is this.

of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gate, some affected the name of Gods.

OF Jupiter Belus, the son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their Gods. But the Egyptians, even after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldaean Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizram, Jupiter Chammon or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Pencer;) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heat: because the said Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the aire is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Cassor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpædon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurencia and Flora which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

§. V II.

That the wiser of the antient Heavens had farre better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other antient and excellently learned, beleeved in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their owne inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in Hell, where hee fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the bookes of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembereth many in that treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice iis delectatus est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jewes, and bookes of Moses; Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to beleeve the contrary, thinking that from thence hee took the grounds of all by him written of God, or favouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authours names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poison, I cannot judge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's feare, whose words, among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato Mosis mentionem facere, ibid. quod unus solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses intum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that hee taught that there is but one God. But for that Divinity which hee hath written in TIMÆO; id ipsum de Deo dispensat quod & Moses; Hee discoursed and tanght the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr), which Moses d.d. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer Moses, Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and, existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent mee unto you; herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod; Moses enim qui existit inquit; Plato quod.

quod existit; for Moses saith, Hee who is; Plato, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expresse the same, hee giveth this testimony: Genitorum Universitatis iam difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can bee more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causus; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causationis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturae dignitate: & nihil est Deo similis & gravior, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God than a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse capit; Because he never had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld even the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Eurpides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

*Caelum terraeque unius forma fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenitas;
Arbores, aves, ferae, qualesq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.*

Heaven and Earth one forme did beare:
But when dis-joined once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we finde the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where exprest the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoide the envie and danger of the time: but that hee could attribute those thingsto the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Jupiter, there is no man who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEUS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall and divine virtues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musaeus and the Hymne following, teachus: Respicens vero ad divinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspicere veritatis regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes innotuit.

Then marking this may sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee fees all.

And againe the same Author,

*Jupiter omnipotens, & primus & ultimus idem;
Jupiter est caput & medium: Jovis omnia munus.
Jupiter est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
Jupiter & mas est, & femina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vius Jupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam primus occuluit, magno post numine, sacrum Correptans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.*

The first of all is God, and the same last is he.
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be:
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall never die.
The spirit of all is God, the Sunne and Moone, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast hee all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Ensebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Pleſius, Danaus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, justus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, intus, gloriosus, charitatus, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, always doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and selfe-charity. Epicharmus affirmed that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was onely and every where powerfull: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the onely King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes: Save onely in that everlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporal, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlatrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty, as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none; save onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum natura causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animarum inspicitor, ædificans mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprehensus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternall preserver of living creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expresse what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvamus libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, in eros & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdome of all Ages, wee shall finde that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgement: never any man whose minde the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that hee hath found by an unresistible necessity, one true God, and everlasting being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it styled afterward in his posterity: all being at length by divellish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best forcing (as the Devill perfwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Judaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUt all these are againe vanished: for the inventions of mortall men are no lesse mortall than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starveth, water quen- cheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Junos Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it selfe, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous build- ings erected to Baal, can no where bee found upon the earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phoenicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske coun- saile or helpe from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollos Priests are become specklesse, and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devill gave way to these his over-throwes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollon at Delphos (one of his chiefe mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repay- red, and re-edified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idolls and Ornaments therein by the Eu- bœan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt: Thirdly by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phœnecies: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian armie made spoile of, de- facing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was againe glo- riously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the successe of his Partian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollon himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols herein, molten downe, and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Jewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were buied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrowne by an earth-quake, and many thousands of the Jewes were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scat- tered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judæa, being by Julian buied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Worke-men, made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the lastrefuges of the Devill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOW the Devill, because hee cannot play upon the open Stage of this World, (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as ever, findes it more for his advantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe than ever. For where- as he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. Hee tells them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and last- ly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth e- very sense: for true wisdom (saith hee) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtay- ning of power to oppress, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician finde in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future judgement, hee perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that hee will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endavours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine pre- sence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the en- trance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-grown with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the o- ther: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joyes) at the other our cruelties, covetousnesse, li- centiousnesse, injustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) waiting for us. And as the Devill our most industrious enemy was ever most di- ligent: so is he now more laborious than ever, the long day of Mankind drawing fast to- wards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

THIS destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Succedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children and travailed into another re- gion. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner: *That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and un- natural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & deorum, contempters of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) junus erat qui deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat: Noah: There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three sonnes, Sem, Japhetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah, (namely Tirca the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pinetrees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soone af- ter should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the aire, Noah and his family excepted.*

But this universall grave of waters, and generall Deluge hath not bene received by all: for divine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth li- eth wrapped up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in some particular pla- ces and kingdomes: moved so to thinke, because in elder ages there have bin many other floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this man- ner, as his words are cited by Josephus. *Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multis confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quandam simul in Arca deventum in hujus vertice basisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conser- vatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quo etiam Moyses Iudeorum legislator scribit: thus saith this Au- thor. There is (saith he) above Minyada (or the country of Armenia) an exceeding high moun- taine in Armenia, called Barison which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were sa- ved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an arke, and rested upon the top of the mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof, and this might be the same of which Moyses the Law-giver of the Jewes makes mention. And of this opinion* were the Thalmudists (saith Annim) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who, after Moses, was one of the most antient, howsoever he hath been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: An te aquarum cladem famosam, qua universus perist Orbis, &c. Before that famous destructione of Waters, by which the World univerſall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Tisea, and his three sons with their wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

But from the vanity of the Greekes, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, fought to perfwade the world that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bæotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiſſimus) Ogygm id appellat Pœta, tanquam pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetuſſimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most antient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that hee lived but in Jacob's time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodiſſimus in the ninth booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, above jugulato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. T hebe are (saith hee) who think that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. betwene these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, bee not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whoſoever makes it most antient, findes above 500. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere, 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if hee place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betwene these two Floods must bee 520. yeeres, to which wee (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except wee call Noah, Ogyges Prifcus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any farther than the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witnesse, that the City of Joppe in Judea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certaine Alars of stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phinix, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe over any part of Syria, much lesse over all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ovid:

Of this Flood of Ogyges was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Lætonê, the daughter of Cæus, the sonne of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, whereſoever she travelled: till at length arriving at the Ile of Ortygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhauled such thicke mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as never was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets; so exact, that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesse mists and fogges than those which covered Greece with so long darkness, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, descrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things unknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have beene discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some warrie disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galileus hath seen through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discoverie of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error: One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such unusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to have had no other token, or fore-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and tooke them all away.

§. III.

Of DEUCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood: nor the Umbri in Italie a remnant of any universall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: Hic temporibus (in VARRO scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CRANAUS, successore CECROPIS (ut autem nostri, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est DEUCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAUS the successor of CECROPIS governing the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPIS yet living, that Flood (called DEUCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypti populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas. MOSES led the people of God out of Egypt about the later time of CECROPIS King of the Athenians, Ascatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Tripas. So as leaving the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was either at the e-gression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753 yeeres, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the yeere of the World 2409, or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codaman; then giving unto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to have beene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phætons time, by the reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives five yeeres after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will have this Flood and Burning to have fallen 14. yeeres before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeere 2440: and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phæton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. & so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: *Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: Thære happened in Greece in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Flood of Ogyges. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacobs birth, there were continued 513. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had lived 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782.
yeeres. And hereto Annus his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres between the generall Flood and Deucalions Flood, to which add 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: *Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo annis Sphaeri, septingenti supputamus anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta a Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second yeere of SPHERUS, are numbered 700. yeeres, and when DEUCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalie drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Aibens, the third from Cecrops: Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely over Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adjoining Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and either the same, or some other particular Flood then happening, oppressed Egypt, saith Eusebius.

And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or saie it to be universall; and Deucalion then King, saving himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preserver of Mankind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Umbri: quia ab imbris diluvii superfluent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by saving themselves upon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach us; shewing who, and who onely then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camenes; (so named from Camefe, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annus his Authors, names for a confort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturne arriving on those Coasts, devised Lawes to governe them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

*Primus ab æthere venit SATURNUS Olympo,
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regna exul ademptis;
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus ælia
Composuit, Legeq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit.*

SATURNE descending from the Heavens high,
Fearing the Armes of JUPITER his Sonne;
His Kingdome lost, and banish't thence, doth flee:
Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne
To live together; and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe fought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Aufonia, & genies venire Sicani.

Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes:

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie give testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these evacuations & replantations, came the Umbri, descended of the Gaules (saith Annus), not of those Gaules of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, even all Hætruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius have assured us: & therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, & dispossessed of Italie againe, before the Umbri were ever heard of or had being in that Kingdome was first called Camenes, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Umbria; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possessed the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy; Lycæon then governing Arcadia: who being the father of two and twenty sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrus invaded Italie, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed into Italie; after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelasgi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his first, speake at large : and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhens their Captaine, that gave name to the Tyrrheni ; who casting thence the Umbri, tooke from them three hundred Cattles, and built therein twelve Cities ; to which (after they had possesst and past over the Apennine Mountaines) they added divers others, whereof Telſina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I doe not affirme; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. III.

Of some other Records testifying the universall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Univerſall Flood, becauſe they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called oggia, which we in Engliſh commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were ſucceſſively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the Infant: ſo did every Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of divine Letters was not received, find no Parent of more antiquitie, than ſuch as they had themſelves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, ſo did others vaunt themſelves to be Indigena, and growing out of the Earth, or invent fome other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witneſſeth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforeſaid) though he alſo affirme by heare-ſay, that ſome Giants ſaved themſelves upon the Mountaine Baris in Armenia, but ſpeaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approved: uſing the word Sermo eſt; That ſuch a ſpeech there was. And Euſebius remembereth a place out of the ancient Hiſtorian Abdydenus: who writteth, that Sisithrus, to preſerve himſelfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ſhip, and Armeniam navigio conſueſcit: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) ſaw ſeven birds, that finding no land to reſt on, returned againe; which he alſo did a ſecond time, but at the third returne the birds feet were covered with mudd and ſlime. To this effect are Euſebius words out of Abdydenus, which may ſeeme a true deſcription (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

in other termes) of Noahs Flood.
Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Græcians inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flood, which also Dionysius Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges: Sub prælo Ogygis, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliacæ: Hercules and Prometheus then living 344. yeere before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Niliacæ: King of the Affryrians, though I doe not beleieve him as touching the time. But this Flood covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; & hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liver, afterward flaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium præter cursum velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, impetu sui consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, voluntis & vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Græci quidam Potæram gestam in fabulam converterunt. Herculeum tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEÏ jecur depascens occidisse. This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in this day called the Eagle: but HERCULES by his great judgement and vertue did againe compress and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channel. Whence certaine Greeke Poets converting this labour and worke of HERCULES into fable table) devild, that HERCULES flew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEUS Liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered;

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Amnius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuerunt prima novimestrū inundatio terrarum sub p̄fco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon): the first, which was universal, of nine Moneths; and this happened under the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, &c. of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, under OGYGES ATTICUS: the fourth of three moneths, in Theſſalia, under DEUCALION: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) under PROTEUS of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samaritances for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Aſia the leſſe, and elſewhere, of no leſſe deſtruction than any of the other particular Inundations, ſaying, that the ſame happened before that of DEUCALION; the Sea of Pentus and Hellepont breaking in over the Land.

But there have bin many Floods in divers times, and ages, not inferior to any of the two last rememberd, Nihassa, and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Pontian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull forme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Africa, Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Therminus speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Flood in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Siggo: in his Nazja omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the fixtall in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. He also remembereth a perillous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vignier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Judgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nimes there were removed divers old heapes and moutures of ground, and many other places torne up and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, divers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Gothes invaded that Province, in the yeere 1156.

6. V.

That the Flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might have beeene foreseene by the Starres.

Now howsoever all these Floods, and many other, which have covered at severall times severall Regions, not onely in these parts of the World, but in America also; as I have learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be attributed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that univerfall Flood, (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especiall commandment of God himselfe, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Starrs, and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes, by whatsoever union, could performe, without receiving from the Fountaine of all power strength, and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mediclinicus, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albi & Mafar, observeth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturne happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos, by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watry Signe, and the Houfe of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moyfture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genefis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by divine revelation, yet (this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Catacraete Cali, Englished the Windowes of Heaven) Moses meant this great and warrie conjunction; the word (Catacraete) signifying flowing downe or coming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heavens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Of this judgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood, that the words Catacraete Cali, or Windowes of Heaven, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for these warrie Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum Catacraete Cali vocasse, nisi partes illas Cali, quae generativa sunt Pluviarum & Inundationum Aquarum, quales sunt Proxima aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as afore said. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catacraete Cali, or Windowes of Heaven) unless be thereby understanding those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendered the Raine, and Inundations of Waters; such as are the warrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable Wisdome this conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as afore said) adde vigor and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaines, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or whosoever else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the universall Floud: And what are Catacraete Cali.

GEN. 7. VERS. II.

Now if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God reſteth the ſeventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new ſpecies) which granted, it may ſeeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters ſufficient to cover the habitable World ſitcene Cubits above the higheſt Mountains. Of this propoſition, whether God hath ſo reſtrayned himſelfe, or no, I will not diſpute; but for the conſequent (which is) that the World had want of water to over-cover the higheſt Mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and fooliſh: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forſooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatſoever was diſperſt therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let us conſider, that the Earth had above one and twentie thouſand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, ſeven thouſand mile, and then from the Superſicies to the Center ſome three thouſand five hundred miles. Take then the higheſt Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Seythia, or that (of all other the higheſt) in Teneriff, and I doe not find, that he that looketh higheſt, ſtretcheth above thirtie miles upright. It is not then niſe poſſible, anſwering reaſon with reaſon, that all thoſe waters mixed within the Earth three thouſand five hundred miles deepe, ſhould not well helpe to cover the ſpace of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth ſo one hundred and ſixtenc times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we conſider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre over and above it, we ſhall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleaſed God to condense but ſo much of this Ayre, as every where compaſſeth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in thoſe Elements; it will not ſeeme ſtrange to men of judgement, yea but of ordinary underſtanding, that the Earth (God ſo pleaſing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Laſtly,

Laſtly, for the opinions of Galienus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Beroſus and others, That ſuch a conjunction there was, fore-ſhewing that deſtruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catacraete Cali, or Windowes of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needes no other anſwer than that obſervation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the graveſt Aſtrologian it was obſerved, that in the yeere 1524. there ſhould happen the like conjunction as at Noahs Floud; than which (saith he) there was never a more faire, dnc, and reaſonable yeere: the like deſtruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Pius Earle of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any ſuch conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other myſterie in the word Catacraete Cali, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses uſing the word Windowes of Heaven (if that be the ſenſe of the word) to expreſſe the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whoſoever hath ſene thoſe fallings of water, which ſometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not brake into drops, but fall with a reſtleſſe violence in one body) may properly uſe that manner of ſpeech which Moses did; That the Windowes or Flud-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That waters fell contrary to cuſtome, & that order which we call naturall. God then looſened the power retentive in the uppermoſt ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Job) he withholdeth the Waters, and they drie up (or better in Latine, Et omnia ſiccantur; And all things are dried up) but when he ſendeth them out, they deſtroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But theſe Bonds God looſed at that time of the generall Floud, and called up the Waters which ſlept in the great Deepe; and theſe joining together, covered the Earth, till they performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vaſt Caves, and the reſt (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

§. VII.

Of ſome remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah, commanded by God, before the fall of thoſe Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wives, taking with them of every Creature which tooke life by generation, ſeven of the cleane, and of the uncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, ſignifieth quietneſſe: after others, and according to the prophesie of his Father Lamech, ceſſation; to whom after-times gave many Names, anſwering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as; The firſt Ogyges, becauſe in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was alſo a great Floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, becauſe he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Promethew, who was ſaid to ſteale away Jupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and underſtood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others thinke, that he was ſo called for his excellent wiſedome and foresight. He had alſo the Name of Janus, (ideſt) vinofus, becauſe Jain ſignifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And ſo Tullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceeding both Saturne, Vranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other antient ſayned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in uſe before there was any Latine Nation, or any King-dome by that Name known. Of the antiquitie of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this teſtimony: *Janus erat nullae erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus peſtoribus nondum haſerat ullae regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit Janus ad ſacrificia: primus enim Aras & temeria & ſacra docuit; In the time of JANUS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the uſe of rule had not then folded it ſelfe about the hearts of men. Janus firſt taught the people to ſacrifice Wine and Meale: he firſt ſet up Altars, inſtricted Gardens and ſacred Groves, wherein they uſed to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater teſtimonie than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agree ſo well with the Scriptures. For firſt, whileſt Noah flouriſhed, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the firſt that tooke on him ſovereigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the firſt that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the Firſt-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the firſt that rayſed an Altar, and offered ſacrifice to God; a thankſgiving for* for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before & after the Flood, Quia praterita noverit, & futura prospiciat, saith ARNOBIVS: Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Janus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confused Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the person of Janus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspicere quàm longi temporis aetatecano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeeres
By those old-times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intituled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisiens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber, and his Nurles Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne joynd with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noahs Flood. He was also by others furnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he lived in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name, of Dionysus, quasi divobonus, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-singer; though Diadorus conceive otherwife, and derive that name a Patre & Loco, Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nysa, a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Tauropbagus; because he first yoked Oxen, and tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; And Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwife Dionysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Bôacrus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danius) from Noachus, (N being changed into B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diadorus complaineth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was furnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecians Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves faime of his enterprises: and these Grecians of Nysa joyne with those of Paropamisus, and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Rivers and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names given him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Narus; Ptolomie, Danus; dividing Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neither doe I find any approved Author that hath written thereof: onely Coropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountaines of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among the people, called Nysaei, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials & Sepulchres wrought over with Cedars. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God & Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he addeth the convenience of Rivers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only

Onely this we are sure of; that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise move, than the Hulke or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible wind at all, which could drive the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpeneit forward, to cut the waves, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax; for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arrived, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it took name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassius, the Inventor of Auguration.

Pencernus findes the word (Parnassus) to have no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes it derived from the Hebrew word Nabas, which signifieth Auguration and Divination or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leafe before cited.

Josephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron; but herein lyeth the difference betwene Aron and Thebet. That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe upon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a Cover and Roofe, with a Crest in the middle thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysofnesse of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is uncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place onely used, is diversly understood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbins, Cedar; the Septuagint, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Other will have it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt was the use to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes ate not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrefying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carrie, and of a sweete favour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because neere the place where the Arke rested there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath, besides the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, & therefore fittest to build ships withall. Percivius conceiveth, that the Arke had divers sorts of Timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke & partition of another; all which may be true or false; if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabines: thereby to sever the cleane beasts from the uncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food, and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compasse; or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have bin a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodom and Gomorah, now the dead Sea, or Asphalter, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

De Civit. Dei.
lib. 5. c. 26.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, fifty of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesia, que fit saluaper lignum, in quo pendit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Iesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq; ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænuntiatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the City of God travelling in this World as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height and breadth, answereth the shape of *Man*s body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bin a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth fix common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens measures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length than it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptoleme Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere; non solum merse sicut Pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multa alites: It was not needfull to conserve those Creatures in the Arke, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non hujus, sed illius fructum verum commedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters which God cursed; for of the forbidden Fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as afore said) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of judgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischiefe and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyenas, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skinnies, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and weare plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and even those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispaguia, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe also offend their tender under their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Gyants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcummers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance we cannot give to the difference betweene them and us) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 50. foot deepe.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Os, King of Basan, had bin nine Geometrical Cubites long; it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had bin Geometrical, then had bin 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath bin nine foot long, and fure weightier and bigger than all *David*s bodie, who carried away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had beene used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to containe five Cubits of length, five of bredth, and three of height) have reached the length of 27. foot high, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders or have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement given in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make five foot; that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doublelesse) might give much the more capacite to the Arke; though it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to receive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the waters, might according to their present quantites be contained in a Vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our nowall measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large Bodies which were in the eyes of Noah might have roome sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a bit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saved, (that is seven of the cleane, two of the uncleane (with necessarie foode) might have place in the Arke; But no hath very clear-learnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubites, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubites, sheweth the whole Concavities to have bene. 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofoe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubite) contained 7500. cubicall Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meate to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeves, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beasts cleane, & six and fiftie uncleane, estimable for largenesse as netic one Beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twentie Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for suppley, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threecore and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their severall Cabbinnes; their meate in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

That the Arke rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

VW Hat time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leave to others to dispute: he received the Commandment from God a hundred yeeres before the waters fell; and had therefore choyce of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into foure, S. Augustin into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a poole might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuacle, or had Windows of Crystall to receive in Light, & keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is, in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the Seate of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the World Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all storie, well generall as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

ANd first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travailed to their first settlement plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singulartie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall & first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke rested upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu, seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adjoining, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiver of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia felix of that name; and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie calls Ocilis, Pinctus Aeyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordai, and Curtius Cordai; Ptolomie Gordai and Gordiai: of which the Countie next adjoining is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Berosus conjectures) for Milyda or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius teacheth the Cardes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordien or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thobath: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which summounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian significeth a place of descent: but this our Iosephus; which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place of Iosephus Kubaris (which name is Kubaris) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Isidore 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called Ararat (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphanius 1. 1. contr. Hares. calls it Ararat, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue significeth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra as Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Labyrinth may seeme to be derived; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene conceived from age to age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, up and downe than to any of the rest adjoining.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so nere a place as Armenia.

But there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

In the first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeere, or in the 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley afterward called Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that country should have spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia is onely interjacent, which might by easie journeyes have bene past over in twenty twentye dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it selfe, which is every where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Defart on the one side resisted their expedition, the river on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surpris of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would have spent many yeeres in that low and overflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which imbroyder or compass it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the works which they undertooke, their unbeliefe; being no sooner arrived in to Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first knowne Citie of the world, founded after the flood about 131. yeeres, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they undertooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to usurpe dominion over the rest.

†. III.

The second argument, That the Eastern people were most ancient in populositye, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The civillitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath bin, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade us, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) have had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philosoftratus in vita Apollonis Tiamati, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wisemen, which dwell betwene Hyphasis and Ganges, use not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Egyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient than Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to have written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eastern world it was that John Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gersow a Frenchman, betwixt both the letters and invention. And notwithstanding that this myserie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinas had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any civil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinas account all other Nations but Salvages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little Kingdom of Perus, which lay side by side to the East India, than in all his other travails & undertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not travailed so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island, thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations have sent out, and not received; lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil, the farther West the more Salvage. And

And of the Isle of Japan (now Zippingari) Venerus maketh this report: Incola religionis, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi; & veritatis indagatores accerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, civillitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have bin employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and divers to other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI RAMIS found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what age she lived, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three Millions to invade India, so to which he adjoynded also 500000. Horses, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we beleeve but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee lived: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betwene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let us then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling, her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES avit majoribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIS copijs: STAUROBATES gathering together greater troups than those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must have beene made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Armie victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had beene so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. yeeres time after the Flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Gestio 73 and then thirty yeeres to Raamah, ere he begat Shiba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeeres to his five elder brothers, which make sixtie five, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Seba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow up, which make in all an hundred twenty five yeeres; there will then remaine sixe yeeres to have bin spent in travailing from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar in the yeere after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the yeere 101. and the confusion to have beene at *Peleg*s birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time; and build *Nimrod*s Tower in the Ayre; and not on those low and marshy grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeere 101. or at *Peleg*s birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere

fructibus fol. 173.

after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLYCAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus. Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India, which granted (the one be- yeeres after the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Strabo rates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperesse of all the part of that world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah defined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western world; (which traualles Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then covered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him; which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where he should (if the tradition be found) have left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton, then into Spaine, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wives: from thence into Italie, where they say he found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say he banished him out of Italie. There be but the fancies of Berosus Amnianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to traualle farre in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and over-grownne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shinamar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man revered both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent perswasions he would have bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which he received even from God himselfe, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personal commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers, which came into Shinamar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus and Calestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Jofan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Jofan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Jofan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited it, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Jofan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe; it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinamar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloved, giving himselfe to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor upon Berosus: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, laboureth marvailously to prove that the Arke of Noah rested upon the Armenian mountaines called Caspri; which mountaines separate Armenia from the upper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordiai, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with error, which have carefully over-seene, printed, and published Prolinius Geographie, in which they are altogether disfevered. For that last edition of Mercators, lets these hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall find nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspri stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordiai, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like dispute. Aberrantur vero omnes, non negligentia, sed ignorantia sitis ignorantia, They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to prove that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who avoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was overflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarnatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the stocke of mortal men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Umbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venit JANUS cum DYRIM, & Galli progenitoribus Umbrosum; From these Scythians, he saith, that JANUS came with DYRIM, and with the Galli the progenitors of the Umbri: And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur; Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Umbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith that anation of Scythians called Araxes, taking name of the mountain Ararat, nere the River of Araxes. And because his Authour Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Sage, as, In Scythia Sage renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Sage mankind was restored, he thrusts, in the Proeme of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Sage, altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos; For Scythia Sage or Saca, is undoubtedly under the Mountaines of Paropamisus; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground: and from thence East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Anniius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath it read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name at Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeede) his fallshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, befallshood in citing this place with these words: Fabulantur Scythie; T he Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giveth this title to that very Chapter. Scythiarum origo & successus, fabula; T he original and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Sage or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca; which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeveth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomie calleth Colchene and Saducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. severall Nations, are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

But to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem est, quæ proprio vocabulo Cassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ofia Oxæamnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis: & parte ipsius maris hinc usq; ad Rhæumnis ofia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Cassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica (or of Asia): on the East by the Imaean Mountaines: on the North by unknowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are in the Saccæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sine Regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he discovereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, & Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, & yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincencius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) ever acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races defended: though he writeth that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salumi, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that travailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travayles are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received received opinion, That out of the Mountaines, Raphai, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; providing by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines interum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muscovia knowne to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marsh grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie Englishe miles, out of a Lake called Imanowesero, in the great Wood Okenizkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Bogithenes (now Neiper) and Dsuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germanie and Sarmatia; and for the East border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Anniius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe above three hundred and a few odd yeeres before his owne time: these be his words: *Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, & gat new seates a little more than 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Goths or Pouloei inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathias lived in the yeere 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Bueholz was in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested, and the Scythia Saca were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountaines, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Jaxartus and Jaxus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Anniius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?*

† VIII.

The first Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neerer the place where the Arke rested.

This if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For Plutarch in the life of Camilus the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neerer unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturnus from else where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travailed not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and wheresoever the Arke rested, there

Iberia

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchia, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchia from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

†. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

So as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybilis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in verum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierome) signifieth high Towers: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiai stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordian, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which disioyne Colchia, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvaile that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow up this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountaines which divide Italie from France, is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spainie is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continuations of many Hills, keepe one name in divers Countries: so all that long Ledge of mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Contras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxia, Caspia, Moschici, Amazonici, Hemiochi, Scythici, (thus diversely called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, even from the new kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those marvellous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Plinie called these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names given by Ptolomie, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and dis sever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: having

description of §. 6. l. 5. c. 27.

vying all these Kindomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) have three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West-banke, and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia; and after the River of Tygris cutteth them afunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Contras, though betweene the upper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Maragda in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Qrontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the River of Bagradas riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hircanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equal the frong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) that is, betweene Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

Now in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and River Janus, & the Mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nisens or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. & 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judaea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountaines Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: & it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palesina, wherethe teachers of the land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bignes at Escol. Now as 32. 33. The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten daies together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of divers chiefe points.

And therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name name of Ararat. But as Plinie giveth to this ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paropontus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betwene France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gave them; the diversitie of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it wafeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betwene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Duraazzo, Adriaticum: betwene Athens and Asia, Aegeum: betwene Sestus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward to Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Judge, which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words beare literally, because they are used to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us touching the Gospel of CHRIST JESUS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had scene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controversie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places wheresoever Moses maketh a difference of Countries; he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Jofan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words; Afterwards removing thence unto a Mountaine East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: having Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Targoma were of the North quarters; and of the Queene of Sabait is written, that she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travailes were precisely set downe upon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judaa, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Celofryans, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so neere unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred to the East, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in fortie five; and those Gordian Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordian Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the Vally of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar North-west, nintie five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregorie and Hierome warne us, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleve Writers (of litle authority) who also speake by heare-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damasceus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civilly, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, prove, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his words who in plaine termes hath told us, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat; and not on those Mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warme East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua Ilh-Adamath (hoc est) yeluluris vir appellatur celebratusque est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was hee called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth, that he was no Wanderer; and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning again in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where he was first delivered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and JAPHET, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than JAPHET.

F these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Saint Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we finde every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue; as by the examples of Henech, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEER, and elder brother of JAPHET, were children borne. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagins, placeth the same words in this manner: to SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEER, and brother of JAPHET the eldest sonne, were children borne. So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in Chaldaea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia; from whence after the death of Tbare he travailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldaea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeeres, and whence Nimrod went out into Affyria, and founded Nineve. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as we can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japheth taking lesse effect, untill divers yeeres were consumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in JAPHETH'S portion: of BEROSUS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of JAPHETH in Italie; and another of JAPHETH'S sonnes TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Japheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japheth as sons to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg's birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeeres after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Japheth were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Islands adjoining, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, saving that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterranean to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Balticke Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilate Deus JAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) JAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word (allicuius) and not dilatare: and the Geneva perswadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatare or amplificari; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was blessing by God to the Posteritie of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japheth's sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleve Berosus and Annius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth yeere of Nimrod's Reign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Funfius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo NIMROD, &c. in the tenth yeere of NIMROD'S Reigne, GOMERUS GALLUS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same NIMROD'S Reigne TUBAL fased himselfe in Aufuria in Spaine (now called Bisfay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the Flood, according to BEROSUS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Funfius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the heighth and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witness: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Tower, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was: For where the universall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let us build us a Citie and Tower (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their Worke above fiftene Cubits higher than the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters, forcibly over-bearing and over-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Hieremy, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty yeeres. For it seemeth, that the Tower was neere finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was throwne down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one another's speech. Now to thinke that this worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeeres; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeere could creepe through 3000. miles of Desert, with Women, Children, and Cartell: let those light Beleevers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason approve it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeeres in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeeres, it were more than foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeeres, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. yeeres (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeeres remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of judgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cartell, to travell 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Deserts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 1000. yeeres than of 100. dayes. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places wherethey found neither Path nor Guide, they have not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten yeeres. And if Nimrod's people spent many yeeres by the account before remembered in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places containyng 36. Degrees, which makes 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) & did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Bisfay is much more: for the bodie of Bisfay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Aufuria or Bisfay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke divers yeeres to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer and Tubal to travaile 3000. miles, to Countreies lesse knowne unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee understood of most part of the World else it is unknowne. And therefore did Annius ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrod's roads Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at once? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Japheth might come by Sea, and so save this great travail through Desarts by Land. But wenever reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may justly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily believe that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cartell, by whose milke they lived and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Drowes, and Heards of their owne, and their owne Sheep-heads and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have gone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdayned all Andalusia, and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreies, and have fought out the iron, woody, and barren Countreie of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Jason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fifty Passengers, yet it was farre greater than any of the former times: Er at enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships unto them:

And for those Boats called longæ naves or Gallies, Pliny saith that Aegæus ascribeth the device to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Jafon: Ctesias to Samyras; and Sapbanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Aegæon: to which invention the Erythrai are said to have added certain numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increased them: the Cartaginians afterwards to have brought them to foure Banks: the Quing, Remi first to have beene used by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans served themselves in the Punicke Warre. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Sesiosiris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Annie over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention; and yet Terullian (on the contrarie) gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the Shores of the Red Sea upon rasses, devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittains had a kind of Boat (with which they crosse the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with Leather: of which kind I have seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves excoriorum circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor) of which Lucan the Poet.

And although it cannot be denied, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew; that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long Voyages to Sea; at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cartell: as also common reason cantell us, that even now when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not have beene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countreies far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joynd both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

§. III.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Meshech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezechiel, CAP. 38. 39.

NOW although many Learned and Reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in the Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his telimonies for currant, have beene by him farre misse-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the first sonne of Japheth posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, saith Marth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chief Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japheth Issues posselt, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Juda, after their deliverie from captivity.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my Servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one Sheepheard, (that is) they shall be united as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infected the Israelites after their returne, and fought to subiect them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Celsyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Juda. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chiefe Princes of Meshech (or Mosoch) and Tubal: and afterward, Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth verse, Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vanitie assayle Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joynd together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierome) speculum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane forme. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so hee taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not a misse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which to agreeth this observation of Beroaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (H) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Hellajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs bee meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Jewes their Tributaries only, but indeavoured by all means, and by all kinde of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrews profess) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominat from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slaine Candaules the Lydian, gave his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygeum Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis Plinie calleth it Gygeum flugnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hilus, and Manander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Countrey about the River Rhodus which runneth into the Hellespus, called the Promontorie Trapeze after his owne name Gyges. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyater obtained, and after him his Sonne Cresus; who (as Junius further notes) having mastered all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gigaria or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Calossyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Jewes.

Now that Magog is found in Calossyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Calossyria habet Bamyce, quae alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syris vero Magog, Calossyria habet in ea Bamyce, quae alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur. Syris vero Magog, Calossyria habet in ea Bamyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. He further telleth that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if wee may beleve Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Orellius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subje unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Calossyria, and the North parts adjoining bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denyed, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east waited the better part of Asia the lesse, and posselt Calossyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judaea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Seleucus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrim thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to have beene called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now the known name is Aleppo: for so Belonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry; and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atergitis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto.

If then we conferre the words of Ezechiel, in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judaea: with whom also Ezechiel completh Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judaea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Calossyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land betweene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part posselt by the Georgians) then is his judgement of better allowance. For without any repugnance of opinions, it may be granted, that in proesse of time these people might from their first habitation, passe into the Countreys neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in After-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Tubelors, as of Tubal, from whence (saith Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the Mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Countrey, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them:

*Hac gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus haec mutat, quae vitæ alimenta ministrant;*

The Chalybes plough not their barren foyle
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For Merchandize, which their poore lives sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to returne thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe over the Streights into that Countrey: and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Tubal past into Spain, and therein built Saint Pual: a poore Towne, and a poore device, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosch or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarm not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarm their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Frontinus (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesachus, qui à MOSE MESCHEN: priusque Messos ab Adulamonte usque, ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hac regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vivit Messen, &c. hac est Asia Magog principatus; Mesachus, whom Moses called Mesch, placed the ancient Messen

Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Maſſica, &c. this is the principall Countrey of Maſſia. And this doth Annus also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesch and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Judaea. Also Ezekiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesch and Tubal jointly. And for a finall proofe, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how farre soever stretched) Ezekiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man believe that these troupes came out of Spaine, over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compass of the then knowne World; he may be called a strong believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is knowne, that Seleucia was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Judaea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyntly unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely, the Seleucida) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet possesse Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesch be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he feared himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germanie, rested long in France and Brittainie, and possessed the utmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, thence did they returne upon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity informing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere joynted, as afterwards in the feares which they possessed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Caesar affirming it, is proofe sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly bene held by their Progenitours. I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothres, for his excellent wisdoms surnamed Dios, whom Annus makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japheths sonnes) they must find him in some old Poet: for Functius, a great Berofian, confesseth: Qua hic Samothres fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothres was, it is uncertaine; neither is there any proofe that he was that same Dios, whom Celsus saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestors, yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mays on ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knowes who he was.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berofus his fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUt before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it is necessarie to disprove the fiction which Annus hath of Noah himselfe, an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berofus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annus seeks to perfwade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he lived 92. yeeres. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if the vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erce, Achad, Chalne and Nineve by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great make to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berofus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greekes, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berofus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annus hath devised five Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berofus. And whereas Berofus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annus hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Aeneas) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Aeneas arrivall into Italy there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the Worlds yeeres (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeeres after the Flood: and so there past betwene Janus of Italie and Noah surnamed Janus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinius followed Fannus: which Latinius lived at once with Tautanus the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fiftie yeeres; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred & fiftie yeeres, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Tones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth sonne of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Helas, which is the same. So had they Medus the son of Madae, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third son of Japheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittain Language hath remayned among us above 2000. yeeres, and the English speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves; though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italie his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have bene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Gracian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius, the first King: which also Saint Augustine and Justine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesfa (others Camafena), the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleve that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungratefull, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremonie, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGORMA of the Posterity of JAPHETH, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere; it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: because the Land was yet Defart, and over-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, & rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seared in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldea, down the River of Gebon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa near the Lakes of Chaldaa, might by the same river get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gebon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chus; because the Dominion and Empire, was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while opprest, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and brother of Chus, tooke both Bankes of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Havilah or Sufian, was anciently called Chus. As for Chusian, afterward Sufa. Chus himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gebon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-west-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desert, where Ptolome placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Ptol. Asiae lib. 4.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulf, which watheth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sons of Chus might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Citie of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said river of Tygris: and from thence a Colony past to Charan, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse, from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phoenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: & the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cimmerians (whence Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intitled. This Nation of the Cimmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountaines about Albania (called Cimmerini) and to the Citie of Cimmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cimmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the our-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cimmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion, but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the unhealthfull waters favouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

lib. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as farres as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschs (which Ptolome calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaine Moschici, in the Valley between the Mountaine Moschici, and the Mountaine Parionides: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis, from the East part Araxis, and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscovians (first Melanthen) and it may be, that in proceffe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanthen) significth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth.

forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his parents and kindred: The Togormians were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes, subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary, forgetting the prophesie of Ezekiel against the Tyrians: They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Faeces, horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Josephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Jewes conceive that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Tigor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmeth, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscovia. But for these subdivisions it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood, is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could be hardly knowne: onely reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the same of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion over the rest.

Nose 2.

From Madai the third sonne of Japheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Javan the fourth son of Japheth: and of Melch of Aram, and Meshech of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth sonne of Japheth came the Ionnes, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine & Greeke Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex eis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Greciam: And I will find those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Genevra here useth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarshis in many places betaken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Genevra use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Ionnes were the Athenians, though themselves dreamt that they were Aborigines, or men without Antecessors, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Ionnes of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marres the fashion of that supposition, who so many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion or Deucalion. Pausanias tells us that Xuthus stole out of Thebes with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erichon, who gave him his Daughter in marriage, of whom he received two sonnes, Ion and Achaus, the supposed Antecessors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionica, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus; who, when he had joynd Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: Writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hac non sunt Peloponnesus, sed Ionia: These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Thyrid.

Strabo our of Hecataeus affirmeth that the Ionnes came out of Asia into Greece; which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Ionnes of Greece transporting certaine companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Ionnes was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this conclusion of Hecataeus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from

Babylon

Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the leffe in his passage; and from thence past over the neereft way, leaving his owne name to some maritime Province on that side, as hee did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleeveth, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times call themselves into that part of Asia the leffe, opposite unto them, which they held for divers yeeres. And howsoever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betwene the Scythians and the Egyptians; as Iustine out of Trogus: in the warre betwene Pexorus of Egypt, and Ninus, was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all salvages, without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

Lib. de Civ. Dei. c. 10.

Psal. 120.

The sixth sonne of Japheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mesech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwene Mesech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mesoch) the sonne of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Mesech, the sonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Mash; Junius, Mesib. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalme; that eyther Meshech the sonne of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave name to that Province wherein David hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Mesib the sonne of Aram. For David bewayling his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Mesch, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinatus sum in diu: habitans iniquam Scenit & Kedarit. The Septuagint gives it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est: habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldaean anotherwife, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Afsana, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever convention be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petraea; and the Chaldaean putteth Asia in stead of Meshech, but the Hebrew it selfe hath Meshech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesib the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took e name from Meshech or Mesib, both bordering Judaea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Meshech and Tubal. But as for those that take Meshech out of the word Mosoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that David never travelled so farre Northward (for to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the Father of the Muscovians; and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Meshech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalme, (Hei mihi quid exulo in Mescho) to signifie, *Gentis ejus feritatem insignem esse: T that the ferity of that Nation exceeded; which fierceness or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Muscovians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarites. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fierceness to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after; even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, & every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which joyne together upon the Nabathae. So it appeareth (as before* before) that Mesech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did joyne to Meshech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the leffe, commanded by the Successors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mosoch or Mosoch might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and given names, both to Mazga in the one, and to the Mountaine Moschici in the other, and from thence might fend people more Northerly into Muscovia, & so all opinions saved. But all salvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, doe (for the most part) have a late plantation, even as Civility, Letters, and magnificent Building, witness antiquity.

10 Tiras, the seventh sonne of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirme. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three, Ascanex, Riphat, and Togorma.

§. VII.

Of Ascanex and Riphat, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

A Scanez was the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (saith Josephus) but he gives no reason why. Eusebius makes Ascanex the Father of the Goths. The Jewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation; but their expositions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Rivers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanex: (for Tuiscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanex, proposito articulo dic Ascanex) & that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like unto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os kumer: sq; Deo similis: in face and body like one of the Gods: Virgil also remembreth such a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Ilus ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem Ascanium: Appetite leads them both over the Mountains Gargara, and the roaring Ascanius. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Ascanius, which is adjoining to Myfia, and is neere the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Ascanex he directs us to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth farre within the Countreys of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles; in which way this Lake lyeth, even betwene Prusia and Nicea. And so Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Ascanex to be the Inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Protony witnesseth: and Strabo giveth Ascania both a Lake, a River, and a Towne in Myfia, neere unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanex the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aeneas son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the Countreys whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myfia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the leffe, which by Hieremy is called Ascanex, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascanex were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanex Esai. 22. against against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name, (saith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phenicia, and Palastina; and therefore Metopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the story of Jacob and Esaú, and call it Aram-padan. Then the two Nations were of the Armenians and Assanex, joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Assenex Germany or Almaine: for we heare of no swart Rutters at that siege. But the Assenex were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almaine; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphat the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Petorius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soyle in those dayes for all the soones and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphat, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Gyants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they croft thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betwene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were posselt of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphat, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Piskula and Albia. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-meats and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javans children, which were foure:

Elisa, Tharhis, Cethim, Dodanims.

Of foure sonnes of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharhis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Aoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that the Aoles & the Elei, tooke name of Elisa, his eldest sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa, Hyacynthus & purpurea de insulis Elisa faia (sum opemimum rum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy covering). The Chaldeans for Elisa write Isalab: but the Palgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Isalab in those dayes, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharhis, the second Sonne of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharhis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharhis in Cilicia, underlands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean Tharphast puts Carthage for Tharhis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went every three yeares to Tharhis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Tharphast translates Tharhis (Africa). But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Ezion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petraea, Idumaea, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Navigation to have spent three yeares in the passage betwene Judas and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have beene sayled in fixe or ten dayes. And if so great riches might have bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written: in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Navie of Ships in Ezion-Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom; and Hyam sent with the Navie his servants: that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420 Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like unto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phanicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharhis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharhis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went every three yeares to Tharhis, that phrase is not strange at all; for wee use it ordinarily wherefoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are fet out every yeare, or every three yeares to the Sea, and therefore Tharhis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharhis is truly taken for Tharhis, the chiefe City in Cilicia, founded by Tharhis the second sonne of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharhis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adjoining) Javan, who was to passe over the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Tones on that shore: gave the Islands betwene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharhis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City tooke name.

The third sonne of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voyce plurall (saith he) and signifieth percuressors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esaú 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hae calamitas ab Elai predicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse everiores Tyri ex terra Cithim: This calamity (saith Melanchton) was foretold by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cithim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cithim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander, who after 7. Months siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seven thousand princiall Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedom of 13. thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Ile of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Countie of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius;) which City Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Ilands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Ilands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharbis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharbis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies over the Aegan Sea, and inhabited Macedonia. 10

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Javan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) fate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharbis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted foyle in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it hapned all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountaines, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeares after: every of their Families being desirous to retainne among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Rivers, as to things (after their judgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Ilands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesoch, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldaa, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sonnes of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) travelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chush, Mizraim, Put, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Aethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Aethiops wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

That Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Aethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther prooffe to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Aethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate downall together. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chush for Aethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne invention. For Josephus presuming that Chush was Aethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. ver. 1. is called a woman of Chush) was a woman of the land of Aethiopia, saitheth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Aethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it selfe, and to deliver it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Josephus. After he hath described the strength of the Aethiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Chambyfes called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desideret exercitum otiosum aggre ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum Regi filia Ania, et nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally, and come to bandy-strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Aethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Aethiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send unto him by one of her truest servants, to offer her selfe unto him, and become his Wife. Which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

¶ II.

A dispute against the tale of Josephus.

His Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, & therein also utterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Aethiopia: as he names Aethiopia it selfe to have bin the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Aethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne, teach us, laying, that the Sabaens are Arabians & not Aethiopians; except Josephus can persuade us, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus a Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prefter John, of the Abissines: wherein that Aethiopian King would persuade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princeesse: which had it beene true, it is likely that when Sisac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as also given aide and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to have beene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the daughter of Jethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and neere Ezion-Gaber, where Salomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumaea joyneeth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraa by the East, to the Mediterranean by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if we marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly lived fortie yeares; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheepe of Jethro his Father in Law Priest of Madian, and drave the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may beleve Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and Friends) neither had he the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianitisse. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Familie. And if Jethro had beene an Ethiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses and to have found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraa (which joyneeth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered forty yeares, and did by these late travailes of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milke of Idolatry, and obdurate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he wate them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamenis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words have this beginning: Menitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceive these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt, being the same that joyneeth to Arabia: so farre Chrisamenis.

†. III.

Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia Ezech. 29. 10.

NOW as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia, so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I com upon thee and upon thy Rivers, & I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the blacke Moors: which last words should have bene thus converted: From the Tower of Seveneh to the borders of the Chushites or Arabians: between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneh to the Ethiopians, hath no sence at all, Seveneh it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor conquest had bene but between Seveneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies joyne together; or all the North parts of England, between Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sence with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida, which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor never entred into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chush.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

AND as the former; so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted: In die illa egredientur nuncii a facie mea in trieribus ad conuertendam Ethiope confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Genevians: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moors affraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have bene (as in the former) amended by using the word Chush or Arabia for Ethiopia or the blacke Moors, every man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing that to passe out of Egypt into Ethiopia there neede no Gallies or Ships, no more than to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparring the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Army might thereby surpriseth them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seveneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gallies nor Ship to passe into it; being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and steepy Mountaines) called Catadupe Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I have already observed, the sonnes of every father seated themselves as neer together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Javan and his sonnes in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sonnes and Grand-children of Chush from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first seare) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had never any acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian black-Moors, as is already remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

AND as in these places before remembered, so in divers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chush, which puts the story (where it is so understood) quite out of square; one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sence hath this part and Judaas; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the neather is bounded by Mempbis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and *Tebaid*a (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the *Aethiopi*ans or black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of Noahs children, for themselves.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunary yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdome posselt by Mitram, changed her ancient name, & became Egypt, at such time as Egyptus (otherwise Ramestes, as some thinke) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made *Dana*i, abandoning their proper names which happened 877. yeeres after the Flood, in the time of Josua, as S. Augusline conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbrell all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. yeeres. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Josua, and about 1000. yeeres after the Flood. But where Josephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moone; whereof Ovid:

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Iove was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true; seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeeres to have bene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelve houres; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary yeeres.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall Flood; and that therefore the first of the other fiftene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the generall Flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynasty (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Salus, to have bene in the yeere of the World 1846. which

Euseb

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynasty to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse than 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but sixe yeeres, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annus in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to preceede the flood, and the 16. to have bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annus makes them all after it. But the contrariety of fallshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annus had forgotten his former Opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod, with the sonnes of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spaine, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrivall into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a government established in the very first yeere of the arrivall of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUt whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius: (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Flood, I doe verily beleeve the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these; Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving beleeve, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavilling humour: for I thinke it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resolvednesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, than to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would have bene revenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues, built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his first-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Salah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) as well Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be possesst before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Army of three Millions, (and the left not all her Kingdoms empty) doe well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean Seas when there had now past from the flood to the time of this her invasion, somewhat less or more than 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled, when Ninus having a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entered (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleve Trogus Pompeius (Eptiomir d by Justin) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For thus be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanax king of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the world was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Bactrians; yea, all the whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbred the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen; and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forreigne authority: for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possesst by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultivate a desolate & overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few daies: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time than 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palastina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprehended, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood: even necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne world; especially where death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld living Nations of his owne body.

M

Selab,

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Petrus:

For what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we have reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of four lives in this Age of the World: wherewith one exceeds 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; may we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not give them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (saving such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have bene increased. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the first Age observed no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Lovers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and fearelesse of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingled together, and sowerth with the seedes of Mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may bee alleaged for sufficient Authours, whom Petrus himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palastina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to bee rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Jewes, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Berosus, it is plain, that his words & sense were the same: for he addeth, from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting; which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to travell over before the Flood, than after it. For Petrus himselfe confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) inclosed for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke over, in the first Age, than after the generall overflowing.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

L Astly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur Israel divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which hee also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text it selfe, rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never bene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novae sedes necessitas compellebat. They were driven by necessitie to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof, Mauritania and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleve Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spain, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the world was overflown, there were people in all the World which offended.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

T Herefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine unto the Sonnes of Mixraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or mettall) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inferred. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astro-nomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 10344. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fires as also of Christ his coming in judgement, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mixraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded betweene Memphis and Syene neere Aethiopia, and had the name of Thebaïda, of that ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates, and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks; Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Josephus calls Egypt Mersin of Mixraim: and Herodotus affirmeth that it had once the name of Thebaïda.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mixraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutici, (saith Josephus) & Phry mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyrris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush, & Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven sonnes.

C ANAAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) possesse all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilea, Samarita, and Judaea; in the later times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Asxah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrhah, and Admah, & Zeboim, even unto Lajsha. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorrhah the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sons of Canaan which possesse this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebusi or Jebusani.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi or Girgesus.
6. Hevi or Chivens.
7. Arki or Harkus.
8. Seni or Sinaus.
9. Arvadi or Arvadani.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Temareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamaheus, or Chamaheus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Girgesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of this.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Z IDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Labulon, & Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could never obtaine Zidon it selfe.

Gen. 10. 16.

Gen. 23.

Gen. 27. 46.

2 Kings 7. 6.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites: or Hittites, one of those seven principall Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Berfabe, and towards Hebron near the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Berfabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, & Mamre; & of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarab buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

§. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites:

Iebuseus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principall seat was Jebus, (afterward Hiernusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country neere it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations disperfed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Calofyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Juda, and in Idumaea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and hee was stronger than the Oake.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites, and Harkites.

The fift sonne of Canaan was Gergesius or Gergesius, (otherwise Girgass) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy fees the City Gersa, which Iosephus calls Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessed with Devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart, their Coasts: because their Swine, filled with the evill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesius also built Beritus (sometime Geru) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Hevens the sixth son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus neere Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Capharim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Jesus, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh sonne was Araceus or Harki, who between the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archeus, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

†. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparofa, which Ptolemy finds in Judea, not far from Jebus, to the South thereof, saith Junius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sin: Ptolemy, Simyra; Mela and Phrygy, Smyrus; Brochard, Sycon; (called Synochis) neere Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini written with the letter C. otherwise Kenei who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei, Balaam prophecied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth sonne was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the Ile of Arados built the City Arados: opposite against which Ile and on the Maine of Phenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antarados. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were they Mariners.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calofyria at Edessa, and founded Samaria, which in Josua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same orthography) upon the Mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chr. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amisse (saith he) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emussani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Calofyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountaine Samaria or Shemerom of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountaine; and called the name of the City which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jewes stood up, they always called themselves Jewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

The last of Canaans sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath, (saith Beroaldus): of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Iosephus & S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountaine Cassius and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania; as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betwene

2 Sam. 8. 9.

Gen. II. 22. 23.

Gen. II. 22. 23.

Apamea and Emesa in Cassitis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea betweene it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proved. For Iosua counting the lands that remained unpossessed, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not have received, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Mesa: and Iosua: for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountaines, and Beroaldus the City in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) writeth Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amarbeos, and the people Amarbeins of which (as I take it) Rabshakeh vaunteth in the second of Kings: Where is the gate of Hamath?

†. I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaans that robbed Job: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham; to make a difference betweene one Him and his Nephew Sheba, the sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma, (or Regma after Montanus;) his name is written with a single (S) Yamach, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schim. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma, possesse both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neere to his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabai, Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi ad utraq; maria portibus gentibus habitant; The Sabaans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Ptolemy. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, & the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leave Sabia: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because because he remembreth a Nation (called Stabei) neere the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinketh it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Job's Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Job in Traconitis, betweene Palastina and Calofyria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so doe I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth upon Job, which forever Beroaldus shall take for neere. But these were the Sabai of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated: the same which Ptolemy calls Save, now Semiscafca: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Magi or Wise men, which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe beleieve, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert: which Citie, when my selfe was there, was as I judged it called Semiscafca. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, is appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so dis-joyined with large Deserts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattel, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi. Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but onely sharpe, and high, stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, betwixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any far travell enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabia, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Desert: only Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabia, there is found of his name the City of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolemy; who withall nameth Saborale, within the wals whereof there were sometimes found fixtie Temples. Ezechiel joyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians, their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopian about Meroe, and Sabia of the Ethiopian Asiabari, they be not worthy any further answer than hath already beene given: especially seeing these Cities, preserving the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabia in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemies time, though in some letters changed. As alfo in the coasts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Desert is found the Citie Saba or Save, (now Semiscafca) with the Citie of Rhegama for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolemie himselfe called Rabeni of Raamab. In Arabia the Happy is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Sapha or Saprah, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabai: and to the South thereof againe toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his brothers and nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by Boate even unto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, set neere the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolemies time.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the West Æthiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the son of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above four thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Æthiopians never saw cloth, till the Portuguese, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civer Cars, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: & all these they exchanged for linen, or iron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negroes of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Lione, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediteran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which sears they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, let us heare Hieremy his owne words: Flye ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Ekau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Province of Arabia Petrea; and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia felix, joyned in that part to Petrea, the fear of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

After Chush, it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the sonnes of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud; the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who joyned them in this sort together: Come up ye Horites, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Blacke-moors, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut, and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush, (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleve it: because Hieremy joyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to bee called Lubim or Lubei, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the true writing writing is, not Lybes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pimut (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same City which was afterward Doispelis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the palsy) standeth neere the Torrent Gana, not farre from Joppa the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Pofsellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes have no proper Countreies given them in the Scriptures, saving Caslubim and Caphorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Pelos.

These Caslubim inhabited Casiotia, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Casius are found, not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphorim seated neere Caslubim in that Tract of Egypt called Setbrois, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Setbrois; Stephanus and Pliny, Setbroitis, of the City Setbron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caslubim and Caphorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyl (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (saith Isidore) do not use the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gassai, Ascalonites, Azotii, Gethai, and Accaronites. Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim; and of that City the Countrey adjoining. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land upon the mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestina, or Stratonis Tower) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: & Goliath was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lysanias. They mastered the Israelites at severall times above 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Samson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countreies adjoining, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Peverius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Josia, yet at the time of the promise it was possessed by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if the Canaanites being the greater part, the denomination were from them? For tharthe Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphor, and Aram from Kir? So I reade this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beoradus condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, betwene Prolomais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneva.

But Pererius calls Caphrorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palästina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palästina, it is not certainly knowne. And therefore in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seems to understand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captured.

Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THE posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, saying that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saying India) which I beleeve Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Opbir and Havilah the sons of Jectan afterward repaired, Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asia usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt: These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

c. 20. §. 2.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered, Acts 2. ver. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Sufan) in Elam was the kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel.) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, & when I saw it, it was in the Palace of Sufan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Eulaus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Assur (as most Historians beleeve) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath bene in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullest Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar? Where is the King of Hamaib, and the King of Arphad, & the King of the City Sebaraim, Hena and Jrab? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Cities, and small Countries as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamaib or Emath in Ituraa, under Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palästina, and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire from whom the most memorable story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth sonne of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

ARAM the fifth and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius out of Iosephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was borne; the same which others call the son of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajim, which is as much to say: as Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compassed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tigris & Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotymia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words converted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Judaei Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant; T hose which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramensis and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not onely of those in Syria inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kenuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Posterity could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Nabarajim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobariis (so called from the River Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajim (which latter appellation question lesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: because the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana: (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were, Hul or Hus, Gether, and Mefch or Mes.

Hul or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliker was the Founder thereof, though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt neare unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Tracemitis, whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people and all the kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul the second son of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third son, Parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Polimie setteth the City of Cholla.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noahs children fathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine owne opinion, I alwayes keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucus, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mefch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neare the mountaine Mafus. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne than by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himselfe and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeares after; and therefore there is no reason to cast them, in the Desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sonnes of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built their owne names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdainning the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are unaccessible to Strangers) an ealie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth son is made the Parent of the Maonians: of whom something hath bin spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Joctan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth divided.

†. III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the division (at Phalegs birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrewes (saith Petrus out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the year after the Flood 101. and lived in all 239 yeares, which numbers added makes 240. And therefore was it so many yeares after the Flood, ere the children of Noah levered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeares as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could be increased, Petrus gives this answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeares, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeares time: and the sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg tooke that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phalegs death (which hapned in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeares before his birth) then was the division 38. yeares after Ninus, who governed 52. yeares: in the 43. yeare of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeares before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers have not beene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præstant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia, received Babylon into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions betwene Nilus and Tanis, the Egyptians, Phoenicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyracanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (I already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not hapned before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the division had beene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoever mens opinions have beene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the division of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in yeare 101. after the Flood, which was the yeare that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten yeares after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth division) must have lived without a name, except the name had bin given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his sonne the name of Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecie (if any such had beene) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative prooffe) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IV.

Of the sonnes of Jochan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sonnes of Jochan were

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Afemath, or Charzar.
4. Jare, or Jarab, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uzal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimacl.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

All those sonnes of Jochan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the world, or India, even from the River Copbe or Choss, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Sebar a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were onely three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the sonnes of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Seba, his grand-child by his wife Retura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Seba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we have left in Arabia Felix: and Havilah the son of Chush upon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primum Sabei: post hos sunt Passagarda: prope vero hos sunt Tasci. The first are Sabeans: after these be Passagarda: and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham, wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthestmost East-Country in respect of Judea; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sonnes seated themselves on the borders of Judea, I rather choseth to leave Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Pytolomy setteth a City of that name.

But Saba the sonne of Jochan, the son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius after in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greeke Verse, habiting the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei: Taxili hos inter medios habitant; Sabeus; in the midst of these dwell the Sabei, and the Taxili, faith Dionysius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Jochans sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome understands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccas. Iosephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cheilonese, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut & Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Aras Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Province of Susiana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Pleſis, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no further dispute, it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain to be called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Jesuite in his naturall and morall History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) tooketh that name of Jochan, who as he supposed navigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What aske you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountaines. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Greeneville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caeri, which significeth an Iland. And in this manner have many places newly discovered beene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certaine Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the red Sea (which was three yeares in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two yeares, and sometimes less: and Salomons ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the Compaſse was knowne, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bin for the plenty of gold in the East India Ilands, farre above the mines of any one place of America) to saile every yeare from the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, & inhabited the richest of those Ilands : wherein they have built a City called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse : neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Toſtatus also gathereth a fantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins : which Mountaines Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words : Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent universa, alites ferocissima, Arimalpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countreies abound in gold, & rich stones, the Griffins defend the one & the other : a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other ; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimalpi make warre. These Arimalpi are said to have bene men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia : of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristotle make mention : and so doth Lucan in his third Booke : and Valerius Flaccus : and D. Scivulus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleve none of them. And for these Arimalpi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eyes ; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gyslotiron, or the Cave of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded upon some true stories or other things done : so might these tales of the Griffins receive this Morall : That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet & moderate estate ; and not subject themselves to famine, corruption, aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be ruined in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountaines, which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons & other ravenous and cruell beasts : unto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimalpi make against the Griffins : not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seeke to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young-ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegarios, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland : for many times the poore Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearle. And though the Alegarios know not the pearle, yet they finde favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

†. VI.

Of Havilah the sonne of Joſtan, who also passed into the East Indies : and of Mesha and Sopher named in the bordering of the Families of Joſtan : with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the sonne of Joſtan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Ilands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which tooke name of Havilah the son of Joſtan : but Havilah, which Person compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture : Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. Foran end we may conclude, that of the threene sonnes of Joſtan, these three, Saba, Havilah, & Ophir, though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Masius or Meſb, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia ; yet at length either themselves or their issues removed into the East India, leaving the other other Families of Joſtan, to fill the Countreies of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to have bene from Meſb unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Meſb to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Meſb is that part of the Mountaine of Masius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charan : and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Sippar by Ptolomey, standing to the East of the Mountaine Masius, from whence Joſtan having many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in proceſſe of time.

The other fashion of planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used : as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East ; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie :) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarajim, to curse thee : for Aram Nabarajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable conjecture ; the Guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to goe after ; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither have I any end herein, private or publique, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himselfe hath disguised all things : so the factious and hiring Historians of all Ages (especially of these later times) have by their many Volumes of untrue reports left Honor without a Monument, & Vertue without Memory ; and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſſe ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving Nature of Time hath worne out or changed the Names and Memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot-steps of Antiquity (as appeares by that which hath bin spoken) are not quite worne out nor over-grown : for Babylon hath to this day the found of Babel ; Phœnicia hath Zidon ; to which City the eldest son of Canaan gave name ; so hath Cilicia, Tharsis ; and the Armenians, Medes, Iberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumaans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulneſſe some signes of their first Founders and true Parents ;

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

6. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreate how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcity of People) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes used both for the Magistrate, & for those of Age & Gravity the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers : God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, &

Governour over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna. Then the Assembly beleev'd them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the People. And so in the words of those false Judges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedamonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedamonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen: and againe: Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestors had never called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Governours or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loysseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or Mastership: the correlative of the one is the subject, of the other the slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his owne: and againe, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singulis dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience (the fruit of naturall reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly over-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the lost weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giver of life) became in all over-weake, either to resist the first inclination of evill, or after (when it became habitually) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisedome was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortall) made both the Wife and Foolish underftand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable than that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equall from equall received equall harmes. In so much that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no lesse perillous than an undividable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse evill, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved soveraign power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Lawes, private affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and evill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other Lawes than the wils of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeares (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that government

firmum judicium, et immutabile providentia

had this mixture of equality (holding in an even balance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in favour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were chosen for their virtues only, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Piccor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dii & diti: Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De amoe. sec. 1. part 1.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence having ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others: For the very Bees have their Prince; the Decree their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety. The most High beareth rule over the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. Dan. 5. 21. Prov. 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. And that this power is given from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above. John 19. 11.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath beene governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Justice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Again, by a Justice divine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Justice civill, begotten by both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded; and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most evident: for Adam being Lord over his owne Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

†. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane society.

VVhat other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall Flood: & very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyranny in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observance of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shall thou make in thy Cities: And these shall judge the people with righteous judgement. Deut. 1. 17.

The second Government is of divers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Arifocracy, or Optimatum potestas: to which Oligarchie (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, feditiously fwaying the State, contrary to their own Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholofanus; unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of Mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many Houholds (man by nature loving society) joynted their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicius; of the Greeke κωμη, which signifieth a Houfe, or of the word (Via) because it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first Houfe grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeke παγος, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Strame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires, answereth not unfaily.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyne and set together divers of their Villages, environing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab oppugnando (because wals were opposed against Enemies); or ab opibus, because therein they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab urbe, because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varron) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very wals & buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo civis, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also knowne. For every Citizen is also a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken of Magistro, sum a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepti of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος): and so the Greekes call them Μεγισταν whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and duty of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity, but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth, but if thou doe evil, feare: for he beareth not the sword in vaine. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subject to the judgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbered of Gods punishments upon those that have refused Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cesar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse quam nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quam Domino servire bono: No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly howsoever it may be disputed, yet is it safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants: under a wise man that is cruell, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered as Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disclaime in his owne house, were very unfit to governe great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds joynted themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joynted together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves under one Government, and Government; they so joynted, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased and the Families became strong and dispersed into severall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintaine life: nor for any other apperrell, than to cover them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times, but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openest and most joviall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes some estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadesh them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sunne whose meanes are answerable unto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites unanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times injurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeares are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the greivous alterations in our selves, and the paines and diseases which never part from us but at the grave make, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of mans nature being also such, as it adoth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper uetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; it comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this advice of Salomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? For thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca, Majores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimus posterique querentur, everos, esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deteriores hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancesters have complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth doe reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are usuall the courses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus capiti nova fuit & repentina: What soever is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and so daime. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set downe for certain, that as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care, and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but even to the meaneest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum, The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a generall love it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the willor dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

Vetus nobilitas non nascitur
sed fit.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprang those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to these dayes. But this Nobility, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue, were so called: Hinc dictum Nobilitas, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Hierome judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate confringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiqua divitiæ; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Pines) be a witness of vertue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Lineage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like unto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled: Ex terra fertili producit aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitfull ground groweth sometimes poisoning Hembane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Lineage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profusion of publike Vertue, serving his Prince and Countrey, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selves acquire by our Vertue and well deserving) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew wel how to wipe off againe. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we have of vanitie in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, than Noblenesse and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Potshave body and barren minde? For (according to the same Father) Dilectum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronat nitorem gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou maiest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myre, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or fluffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning clouds, which doe or will soone passe over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Sovereigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have beene of just authoritie.

THE first of all that reigned as Sovereigne Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by by Chulph, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chulph, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no respect.

[illegible]

But howsoever this word (an mightie Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrewes; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troupe or among the builders of Babel.

The fame is also confirmed by divers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Sapbite, and Javan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe to Heber West as Shinar (his lor being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Fabre, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southernmost parts of Chaldaea about the Citie of Uz, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

into Canaan. And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the unbelieving worke of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah: and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Hebræ remansit he lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Ephraim) and this Language Abraham used; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Celestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius Forcell, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly feed of Sam were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct persons.

BEngo, and out of him Nauclerus, with others, make many Nimrods, Eufebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome upon Ofz; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnavit post mortem patris sui Bel, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos. Tunc ibi Ninus regnavit the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixtiefour yeeres. But it could not be unknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establishr of that Empire: Mose being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it befit agreeeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken the Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not prove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar overthrew the liberty of the Romane commonwealth, making himselfe perpetual Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraigne authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity; laying the foundation of Sovereigne Rule, as Casor did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Ptererus is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining-but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the City of Nineve.

Now whereas D. Scilius affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians; the same rather proveth the contrarie, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the feare of his Empire at Nineve in Affyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdaine thereof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by strong hand; which was cause Babylon being not walled till Semiramis his time.

— Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis urbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty (6 Juſtine hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that ſuch an addition might have been given to many other Kings aſwell. For if we may believe Juſtine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Mofes (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confition of languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chaine: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have beene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities: but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing to doe or erected to his hands:

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beleefe. The Citie of Acad, which the Sep-tuagint calls Archad, & Epiphanius, Arpal, Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Acadene for Acadene. Others under-understand Nisibis and Nineve to be one City: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charan, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charan are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Acbad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erech, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine Oreg, and Pagninus Erech, this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana; but there is also a City in Camagena called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinifis: of which Am. Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Selencia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Vierbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre removed, and that these foure provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalneh from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalneh, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva translation favouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalneh is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradis. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Nineve: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built it, of the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controversy wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not dis-joyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confute the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris: & terra illius processit in Assyriam, ubi edificavit Nineven; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Nineve. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be he eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and setteth downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Javan and his sonnes: for of the rest rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbrell the sonnes of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not dis-joyne the storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene against order; neither would Moses have past over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shems sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comestor, in historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur id est, Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abraham misit factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (widellect, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliacionem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doe doth Methodius, and Vierbiensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornilius, who (saith he) tooke upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Ose, &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Metz in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, understands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrary Calvin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversitie in the translation and understanding; in so much as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nineve: contrary to the former translation of Junius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembered: unto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly waisted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (invincible as themselves thought) should also soone after be over-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Eccce terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem aradachornis robustus ejus, suffuderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

That so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For opportunitie being a Princeesse liberrall and powerful, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wiledom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding mindes of men receive all those helpes and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the division of the tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made unto them, held the power which they posselt, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & undertooke to inhabit all the knowne parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not have beene posselt in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neither did those that went, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous successe) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their owne Traavailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatness, either possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Minuters and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings & Conquests of Ninus (the son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led himin the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he first tooke on him Sovereignty and sole commandement of all those the children of Nod, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error; (as Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes of me, rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Isidore, that lived certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affines unto it.

Hence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Sarapes: so was it used (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

See more of this, at the first Part. cap. 2. §. 6.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinity) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belpheub, and Beelzebub. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Principes militie, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel expounding secrets: Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: Hiero in Job. c. 2. and faith, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his father set up to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lycanus) came Idolatry: and the first title of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, or Idol: or ancient; adding, that as among the Affrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God: Glycas makes it an Affrian name properly: and Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moa-bites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is of Saint Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebut (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jewes expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (saith he) Lord thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouthes. For although the name of Baal or Babal, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tangam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Beelzebub, Belphegor is expounded out of Facinus, Dominus specula vel custodia: The Lord of the Watch-Tower, or of the Guard: the other word north the Idoll, and the place where-in it was worshipped. It is also written Belpoor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joyned expretheth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was used among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the sonne Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Satur ni dicitur familiarum Nobilium, Regumque; qui turbes condiderunt sensim; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi; et ancientissimi of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first-borne, Jupiters and Junoes; and their valiant Nephewes, Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. River) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) upon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was father to Egyptus. They adde; that this Belus carryng a Colony to the River of Euphrates, there built a Citie in which he ordained his, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Teglanus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

As for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River (saith he) there are gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Bricks, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyrril against Julian, that he obtained divine worship yet living:

Aut deo spiritus lib.

Diad. 13.

Strabo l. 13. c. 3.

L. 1. c. 1. c. 1. c. 1.

of the Devill to doe mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fift Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Divell prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Devill by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaans: who tooke upon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their events: and this they wanted to performe by the influences of the Starres by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeite the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kind of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Judeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Astronomie, zicke and Astronomie, who before Abrahams coming unto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium praestantissimus, Chaldaeos primum, deinde Phenices, deum Egyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & divina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaans; then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and divine knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabbings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes, Virtues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villanova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Theophilus; among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zoroastres: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abraham; & the Italians, Petrus Apollonius. The Magick which these men profess, is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruentissimè, ut inde opera producant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magia est the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, so the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes.

In all these three kinds, which other men divide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the creator of the Universall: he beleeveth of the Trinity, which he could not investigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise, approveth the immortalitye of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, & Love, discounting of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Pselus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phenicians, using Zoroaster owne words: Hec ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenitus, expert partium, sibiipsum similissimus, honorum omnium auctor, munera non cupiens, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra naturae unicus inventor &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word, God the first incorruptible, ever lasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the only inventor thereof.

Sextus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldaans, doth distinguish those wise men men into five orders, (to wit) Chasedim, or Chaldaans: Aphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Ariolae, or Sophists) Mechaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poyseners; and Gaxarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chasedim were those which had the name of Chaldaans, which were Astronomers: Hi celorum motus diligentissimi spectarunt; Tunc did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Aphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the son of Beer) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinius, and Justine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancesters.

Mechaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of *His Majesty*es booke of Demonologia.

Gaxarim, or Aruspices (after Saint Hierome) which divine from the entrails of beasts slain for sacrifices: or by Gaxarim others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceive the difference between those wise men, which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truly observeth, Praerant religioni Persicae, ut in populo Dei Levitae studijque vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque perciperet; The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, & they were given to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sextus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his owne words are these: *Et ne quem moveant praemissa Polychronij & Theophilij testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram ubiq; ab Origine damnatam, quae per fœdera cum demonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quae ad praefectum naturalis philosophiae pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with Devils; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practicke part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutual application of naturall virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.*

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these foure kinds of wise Men formerly remembered, he useth this distinction: *Quos non barolos; ceteri incantatores (id est) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine utuntur & victimis, & saepe coniungunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldaeo Genethliacos significari putat, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoque & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Salvatoris ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethleem ad adorandum puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Incantators, seeme to me such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldaans I take them to be signified by the name of Conjurers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldaans; yea King and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativitee of the Lord our Saviour they first of all understood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethleem, did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is,* great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus bodie dicitur, qui ex fadere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcumque, That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entered league with the Diuell, useth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which undergoe that title, were invented by the fallhood, sublety, & envie of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certaine ceremonies, Per mala fidem; By an evill faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Jewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecashim; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consecratio autem communis Magos pro maleficiis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) understandeth Witches under the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavescent Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtst thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch or Conjuror, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession, but only idle ignorance, the Parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit miserieventia quorundam operum, quae vera opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procuratio demonum, naturae ipsae vel conjungentium, vel commissentium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hac. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant: The marvelousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes have bene done by procurement of Divels, joyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought to be workes of the Divels by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magick, which men call very improperly Necromantie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Divinitie of Christ: for other-wise (to use his owne words) ignorantis terminis potentia & virtutis rerum naturalium, haec nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia: The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not understood, we must needs doubt whether those very workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall means: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non haereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verisimilè & Catholice per salem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I sayd not haeretically, nor superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magicks we are furthered in knowing the Divinitie of Christ. And seeing the Jewes and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not above Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeares fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and divine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either converted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Diuell here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude evil things, under the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum cultor & interpret: A studious observer & expounder of divine things; and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magick) no other, quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio: Than the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophy: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forthwith with wife and learned men, promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawfull and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Divell hath shuffled in, & by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Divell (who knoweth more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, & Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Divell also in the Oracles of Amphiarauus, Amphilochus, Troponius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of judgement is ignorant, that the Divell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie; by giving adivine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Buncking observeth) it is true, that judicial Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and governe the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have severall and proper names; so have they severall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good & profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Divell causeth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers and Incantations; and taught men to beleeve in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his own with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wife and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and fly into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken fure weather; that the crying of Crows and bating of Ducks, foretew rain: for they feeble the Ayre moistened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Even the Storke in the eyre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, & the Smallow. Hercules, this enemy of Mankind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to judge of good or ill successe in the War: and (withall) to looke into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the livers & bowels of birds and beafts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles; but Heathen Princes also, as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by Dreame informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For at it is remembered in Job: In Dreames and Visions of the night, when sleepe falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his captivity: therefore, I say, doth the Divell also practise his Divinations by Dreames, or (after Plariscensis divinitatis imitationes) his mocke-divinitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconvenience hereof, because all dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawne to Divination, forbade the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be condemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grievous diseases that oppress him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Prolomies poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Milanoise, whose son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquitance lay to discharge it: not that that of Asiages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

§. III.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their practices.

Deut. 13. & 18.
Levit. 24.

BUt it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a sort forbid it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this, divers answers many be given. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evill or unlawful Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Sooth-sayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel mistook and forbid the execution of that judgement, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful Arts (though not unlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Divell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them

NOWITHSTANDING this mixture every where, of good with evill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forebare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Divell in the Image of Baal, Astarte, Chemosh, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeve the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehore wife and learned men in these dayes from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Divell, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Divell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or evill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Raine, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemne all honest Trades and entercchange among men (for there are that deceive in all professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornfull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Plinius teacheth) we should shew our selves ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull we should shew our selves towards those, who with paines and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also and Professers thereof: though those that are excellently learned judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scilicet casu comparatur, elucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate. In the Theologie, the Classe of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of Knowledge, not in an obscuring, but in a more and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this againe there are diverse kinds. The one is an Invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the Divell himselfe gives answer in stead of those that seeme to appear. For certaine it is, that the immortal soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of raising up Divels, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleeve that by terrible words they make the Divell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtlesse, they forget that the Divell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearful word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seate, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet resolve himselfe, that he can draw the Divell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Divels seeme to use, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raise them up; as His Majestie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught: That the Divels obediente Sunt in mundo genus quoddam potestatum velle de dictum, typis diffinitionis & inconfuturum; quod neque eorum a solo me, que possibilia discerni ab impossibilibus.

I cannot tell what they can doe upon those simple and ignorant Divels, which inhabit Amiblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, doe no way need any such enforcement.

Or it may be that these Conjurers deale altogether with Cardani mortall Divels, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Divels lived not above a thousand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Divels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly matched. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him up in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prankce at other times upon his owne accord the Divell played with Theodosius: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have beene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budae, a principall pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as So. Ense bibl. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 10. Confess. c. 14. lib. 1. c. 13. in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth; and for a manifest proofe hereof we see in every every day, that the Divell leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conveigh them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For so those that received not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transporations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majestie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses & Crystals, of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in angulo & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore. They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nailes or in Glasses: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven, and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the divell have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Enforcement, are men of evill faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Atmotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Falcination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse envious and cruell, revengefull and bloody, than the Divell himselfe. And these accursed creatures having sold their foules to the Divell, worke two wayes; either by the Divell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, His Majestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Divell.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falcination, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet: Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheate out of his care: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to finde his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or intind any beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marians a people of Italie practised: Colobrus disrupit Marius canis: inchanting Marius makes the snakes to burst.) That hath bene used it appears, Psalme 58.6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde, and even by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantments than to draw out a Moufe with a peece of tosted Cheefe.

§. VII.

Of divers wayes by which the Divell seemeth to worke his wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not give to the Divell any other dominion than he hath (not to speake of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their own reason dissuading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatus (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas beluas. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaohs Sorcerers produced, were not naturall, but that the Divell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Varinus observeth, those Frogges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Nec sane Dæmones naturis creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sunt commutant, ut videntur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes mentes intelligentia, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Divell fills with certaine clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Booke of de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Divell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes and blinde them, it is nor hard for him to dazzle those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Divell entereth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the foule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magica artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another caule like unto this (to wit of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per atræa cum pascivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine beleeveth that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magick he useth these words: De hujusmodi autem operibus est fabita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiuvantibus, quæ ipsa semina natura constant & accunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accedat, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus nature videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the so daime generation of Frogges and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, & quickning them in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvelle not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Devils doe must frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature, and by illusion: for their is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as move it or compresse it; who knows not that these things are also naturall: Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the successe of every counsaile: he that by reason of his swift morions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie & practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes ghesse rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe quest which her husband had under-taken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

THis she did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Babylonia, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea, and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the works of Nineve, he left the World in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. years. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenaeus, and others, speakes of five dayes. In which time (moved either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldaea, to Nineve in Assyria. Justin reports that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in the person of her sonne Ninus or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninus had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very performable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 42. years after by any such subtilty: (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninus or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

Some Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have beene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascalonensis, of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had professed a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adjoining to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a godly young man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which used to feed upon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonor and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty & humane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the invention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius thereby by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritime (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phenicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty goods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her services.

But for her Pedigree, I leave it to the Assyrian Herald: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for her selfe: all but her last enterprize of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army there survived but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the famine, or slain by the word of Staubroates. But as the multitude which went out accompanied of such an Army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers she levied by her Lieutenant Dercetanus, (saith Strabo) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side, ten two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of Galleyes three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phoenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beast but fed upon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but is inferiour to that of Semiramis yet it had weight enough to overload the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Provinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted, the same being broken and overthrowne by Staubroates upon the banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extreamly she sang her last song; and (as Antiquity hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

Among all her other memorable & more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, environed with a wall carryed four square of great heighth and beauty, having on the Tower of a square certain Brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square the raised Base of a lesse circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldaean Priests made the observation of the stars; because this tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower have many Travailleurs beene deceived; who suppose that they have seene a part of Nimrods Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the soile; which Alexander is said to have repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have beene in his desire so to doe; but he enjoyed but a few yeares after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicua undiq; navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull observer of rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a la sommite, & tirant une fleche in l'air, ne peult pourroit l'envoyer hors de la base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as hee can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. 1.
Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousy hee every year changed his Provinciaall Governours, and built Colleges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced againe the Bactrians & Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented jewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meete these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, & Xerxes or Balanus. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertaine, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch up the story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare; No marvelle if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's birth, and in what yeare the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three year of Ninus was the birth-year of Abraham: by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall therefore by set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. years; others 352. years between Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

often disputed, but never concluded. Archibuteus de temporibus (as we find him in Annew) makes but 250. years from the flood to Ninus; then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three years of Ninus, according to Enchiridion and S. Auguftine, it followeth by the addition of thofe two numbers, that the year of Abraham's birth was in the year after the flood 293.03, as the moft part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me give reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envie casteth at novelty, than to goe on lifelessly and sleepily in the eafie wayes of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversify.

6. II.

§. 11.
A propos of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the year
292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

THOSE which seek to prove this account of 292. years, between the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70. years, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran; secondly, upon the opinion of Josephus, S. Augustine, Beza, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are lightly lookt over) seeming of great weight.

before them : authorities (while they are ingenuly looking for
From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie ; That Terah at 70. years began Abraham, Nahor and Haran : and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the fon of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seventieth yeare of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing ; and not of Nabor and Haran : for the scope of this Chapter was to fet downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard to Nabor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and fo are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was borne more affluently in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 137. 132. &c. Moses having no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan after forty yeare in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. years: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. years.

6. III.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

To answer all which objections, it is very eafie, and to which I will adde fomewhat by diuers learned Diuines long fince, and to which I will adde fomewhat of mine owne, according to the fmall talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the ftate of the queftion cannot well be fcaned, unleffe the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be firft confidered; before I defend unto the particular examination of thefe arguments, I will make bold with order and method fo farre, as to fearch into a ftrange tradition concerning his trauailes, that ferueth as a ground for this opinion & a bulwarke againft all that can be faide to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former perfectly upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture, drawn from a place in the E- to go out into a place which he should afterwards receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the fame is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, Acts 7. 4. that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perfwading, that Abraham made two journeyes into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability; or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can pick up any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham pass't into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be beleev'd in the rest. But that he performed the commendment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves.

ving his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred; that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jewes, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make us think that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced to do; to wit, we consider, that he had no other guide, or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrivall, and driven thence into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was old, and he had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe over the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe over the great river of Euphrates, to travell through the dangerous and barren Defarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermom or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all 600. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe (that he had not animus revertendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: & they departed to go to the land of Canaan. & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare unto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could have bene thereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unfettled, and preft with extreme famine at his first arrivall. For had his Father bene then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and reliefe, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a mere stranger both in religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the

the time of his fathers death : so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should doe well to make plaine, if it be not over-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Harar at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeares old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within foure or five yeares after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his only care? Did not he binde with a very folemne oath his principall servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to traueile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, to be linked in marriage with his only sonne, who was then five and thirty yeares old, before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children: rather than have left all at randome to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleaved) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there; or that somewhat hapned which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that *Abraham*s man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his Masters prosperity, telling us newes, that Sarah had borne to him a son in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately bene among them, would not all this have bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long upon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to have returned backe to Harar, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how auerse he was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, even though a wife of his owne kinred could not have bene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his owne linage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he liued there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brieue saying, Remember Lots wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Exechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceived great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophetic which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsell of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horfes. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances doe (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perfwade those of judgement or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Harar, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proove it, I will beleeve as they doe. For all the traueiles of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Harar or Charan: and then from Harar (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he he removed to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattell were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence having pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumaea under Abimeles: and after neere unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Morish. But this fiction of his retreat to Harar or Charan, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason be therewithall beleaved, that he would in those his first traueiles have provided himself of some certaine seate, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, family, goods and Cattell, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when he came from Charan, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth going and journeying towards the South: and alwayes unsettled. By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrei.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly bene in the Country, we may note, that ere he came unto Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this Land, shewing it him as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknowne. For Abraham without any other provident care for himselfe, beleaved in the Word of the living God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherite.

Lastly, what should move any man to thinke, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of *Abraham*s, seeing he setteth downe all his passages else-where long and short: as when he moved from Sichem, and seated betweene Haie and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and sate downe at Gerar, being lesse than sixe miles? No, Moses past over all the times of the first age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting up all betwene the Creation and the Flood in sixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham, fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeares. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning *Abraham*s travels, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and comming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to *Abraham*s storie.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham to his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

Now touching the objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to have a son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre, Loe Sarah thy wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sonnes after *Sarah*s death, as Zimron, Jockhan, Medan, Midian, Shibak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeares after Isaac: and the youngest youngest forty yeeres after. What strangeness then, that Terah being 130. yeeres old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeare 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if 2007. Obed, and Jesse, who lived so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age and seven yeeres after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of *Abraham*s age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

It followeth now to speake something to the objection, which brings *Abraham*s age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. years old. For *Abraham*s age being made uncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of *Abraham*s age, unless we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death: then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath told us, that *Abraham*s departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Rebuek, & Rebuek of Rebecca, the mother of Israel; and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob; Milcah also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Rebuek, was *Jacob*s grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90. years, and when by nature she could no more conceive. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nachor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nachor: it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Jos. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their naturall Countrey, and City of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gave his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kinsmen: he himselfe having also married in his owne Family: not thinking it pleasing unto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of *Abraham*s demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Rebuek, and said: This thing is proceeded of Jehovah; meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written: Take heed, that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This sheweth often of

Gen. 24. 31.
Gen. 24. 30.

of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, it is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some later Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because hee retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called *Abraham*s servant, blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe dare not avow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

TO the maine objection; which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of *Terah*s life; grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proove at all that he was the eldest and first-borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; no Juda and Joseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham: The order of natiuitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which Abraham is preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: For it was there Terah began to beget sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 30. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Abraham begat Seth at 133. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalael at 70. Mahalael Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of *Terah*s sonnes, than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut prior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, quæ in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior iuris nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So the naming first or last proveth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, & the eldest and first in Gods favour. *Pietas ergo, vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quæ commendatur scum trahit pietatem, & Deitorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth evermore draw with it or after it, piety and the feare of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.*

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entered Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. yeeres. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had continued 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of More in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Terah

Gen. 11. 26.
Gen. 12. 13.

Gen. 12. 4.
Terah

GEN. 14.

Terah begat Abraham at 70. years old, then must Abraham have been 135. years when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah: which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For he entered at 75. he refused Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86. he at Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. year of his age; then had Terah lived till Isaac had beene 35. years old, and Ismael, 49. both which must then have beene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else beleve the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word μωτα may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to have beene borne in the seventy year of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authority will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldea, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrivall into Canaan. For the year of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083. and the year of Ismaels birth was the Worlds year 2094. which maketh 10. years difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountaine Morab therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in lesse than ten years after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. year of Terahs age.

GEN. 12.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have beene the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205. years; and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder; if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isab wanted but ten yeares of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeares old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had beene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine yeares old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeare after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeares as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine yeares; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isab was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Isab or Isibab inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to speake of any thing superfluous, it is not used in Gods Booke: and if Isab had not belonged to the story, it had beene but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had beene true (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Ismael and Rebecca, the mother of Isaac, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Isab in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else said or left?

The age also of Lot disproveth the elderhip of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeares old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcab; Abraham marrying one of Abrahams daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeares as old as Abraham: it may appear to every reasonable man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first, and before his Father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams elderhip, upon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but ten yeares younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his words are these: si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Sarah: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & idè melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimus natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ejus repositio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem. &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeares old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of Thare, nevertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because hee was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made unto him; as before it is said of Sem.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times make all ancient stories the more improbable.

I therefore agreeeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. year of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeares old; these two numbers added make 205. yeares the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I have no other end herein than to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story. I reverence the judgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controversy. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his sixteenth Booke de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question upon Gen. But Saint Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim praefectos habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao invading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Josephus is not to be beleevd, but with discrete reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeares from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrewes. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings under whom they lived, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing usual among them, to maintaine whatsoever they have beene formerly knowne to hold and beleve. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times, Beroaldus, Codoman, Pencer, Calvin, Juinus, Beza, Broughton, Dodg, Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have beene borne in the 130. year of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those nevertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chiriacus, Franciscus and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Senus Calvinus, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poysonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornicius a Priest of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alleging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to hereticks. For my selfe I doe neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apperant to all men of judgement, that the best approved Historians, Divine and Prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgement to our selves, which of these two accounts give the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures, teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. years, or thereabouts, between the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. years between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. year of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, borne when he had lived 130. years. And if we looke over all, and do not hastily sacrifice our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated doe slothfully and drowsily fit downe; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it above 1072. years between the Flood and Abrahams birth: than to take away any part of those 352. years given. For if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, we shall finde that it were very ill done of us by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply betweene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wheresoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-understood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palästina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed apparent of more antiquitie, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to begot doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvelles? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the World and Mankind.

§. VII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alledged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. years were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43. year of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the year of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. years to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. yeares more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeares to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparifon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Reu in the same year of his life.

Let us then allow 60. yeares more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which year they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeares remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaine sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeares of the 352. from the Flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. needeth bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine yeares: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelve: whereas Sale, who was the sonne of Arphaxad, the sonne of Sem, lived four hundred three yeares: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeares: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeares, and died in the 52. year compleat of Abrahams life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeares, in the second year of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeares old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprize Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeares, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeares after Semiramis died: which was the 75. year of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to have bin this Ninias the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeares, as aforesaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeares: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine, unlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impietie, or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fables.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the raigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most propable, is that which hath beene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Bajan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve yeeres were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprize, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being feated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two being feated over Amraphel, being feated to the West of Sennaar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomorrah, &c. were his vassalls, and not Amraphels, yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betweene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

6.X.

§. X.
Of Arioch another of the foure kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have beene King, lies betweene Coelosyria and Arabia Petraea.

[illegible]

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, doe neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countreies: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull than fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the River of Arnon on the Southside, and by Lybannus on the North, consisting of the two small Provinces of Trachanitis or Basem, and the Region of the Mobabites: a conquest farre unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great kings of that part part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Helleſpont, or any other part of Aſia the leſſe. But as the vulgar and Aquila convert Elaſar by Pontus: ſo Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to joynce with the Aſſyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Elassar at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountains whereof the Arke did rest; so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Elassar, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Perevius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable than this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Gracian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Caesolyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Caesolyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was in the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas; as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, and the principall Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Algyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Seacolt, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Aretas, or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose formes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and bloud: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings?

The fourth King by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Varatlas takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation. Peterius out of Strabo, Strab. lib. 16. p. 533. findes that Galilea was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galile, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdomes adjoining to Phœnicia, and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Basæna, Laodicea, Apamena, Chalcedon, Cesiois, Chalibemitis, and all these doe also joynne themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia, on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture. Ge. 14. 2.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

LASTLY, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall governour of Babylon, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldaa, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedorlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so 2. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I believe that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamurlaine conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to prevalent furie God hath adjoynd a short life: and whatsoever things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her sonne having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no lesse feminine than he was masculine. And as wounds, and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, by revenge the other: so those Kings adjoyning (whose subjection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the advantage was offered by such a successe. For, in regno Babylónico hic parum respiciunt, sibi Regi shined little (saith Nasclerus of Ninus) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men having beene before galled with the yoke of forraie dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery: no long descent having as yett invested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeares, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indoevoured to gaine what he could not govern, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perill enjoy.

These Considerations being joynd to the storie of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken a sunder, and restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that such time as it pleased God to impose that great travaile upon Abraham, forme ter in Chaldea to Charan, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeares of Ninus, when Abraham, obeying the voyce of God, rooke this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her selfe, utterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engines of warre, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunitie even to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Aries the sonne of Ninus, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Cassians, and againe subjected them: which needed not if they had not beene revolted from Ninus, after Ninus death. And as Arieh recovered one part, so did Balens or Balanens, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom it said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher; which undertakings had bene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninus, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninus or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses, as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninus, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all writers, whose workes have come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, & those fellows, were Lords of those Regions; whereunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost enforce us to thinke that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this Historie: removing thereby some difficulties, which men perhaps have bene unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had bene a strange conjecture to thinke that Arieh was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, & Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being dis-joynd by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrab? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoraster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Townes, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of evasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the river of Indus?

unlike to the Friarly book of Afenath, Potiphar's daughter: but unto such as consider that God workes usually by means; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should have spent 42. yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undisputable truth of Scripture doe confirm it. Nevertheless I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Aegyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of divers errors about the former Sesostres.

Concerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proofe, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alleging no witnesse, but as it were saying, Telle me ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soone undertake his Fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the same quarrell, as hath beene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aventinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleve it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seven yeares were spent, howsoever divided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven yeares after the death of Osiris, forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeares of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeares. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israhel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeares by our account: who (according to Berosus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham — 350 which summe divers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeares from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostres or Sesostrius: who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonii: not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to have oyer-run a great part of Asia: to have built a fleet of ships on the Red Sea: and so to have entered into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justin erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Justin placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostrius, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israhel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Taphres, tooke Gerar, and gave it to his daughter: (as we may reade more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israhel, when he made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Taphres and Neco it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostrius. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, for as much as he came into Judah with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostrius next to Orus: following the Scholiastes Apollonii. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For, as Justin witnesseth, Sesostrius, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came up purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostrius, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse, Sesac had 60000. Sesostrius had 8020. charriots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostrius made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had favoured even against Salomon: therefore Sesostrius must needs have reigned whilest Israhel abode in Egypt.

From that time to the — 75

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menus, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Osiris did succcede those fiftene gods, namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menus. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings Sesostrius was no whit inferior to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone upon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was being by his owne brother purposely fired: which nevertheless he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three yeares: after which time he chose rather to die than to live; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesostrius left a sonne, whose name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesostrius; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a javeline: which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where exprest: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Busiris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeares after that this Sesostrius had beene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeares at least. That Busiris began not untill these 14. yeares at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busiris, to the departure of Israhel out of Egypt, plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed upon, to have beene 75. yeares. That none came betweene Sesostrius the second, and Busiris or Orus the second, it stands onely upon probabilities: which are these. After Sesostrius had reigned some while, he fell blinde; after certaine yeares he recovered his sight, as is said: which may have beene true, but is more like to have beene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking upon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindness, and when he was well againe (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. yeares: so his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not very short. His workes are largely set down by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to have beene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and flues of Nilus: whom I thinke so he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades, and shovels, than with darts, and javelins; and by his diligent oversight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples love; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

Exod. 4. 19.

and Egyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armetus or Danaus did succeed Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeares. Ramefles followed, who reigned 68. yeares. This Ramefles or Egyptus is that Armesefmianum or Armesefmianus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Ediff made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, returne to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same king under whom Moses was borne, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. yeare of his age: and fled into the wilderness, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Ramefles, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time uncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeares more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Thumosis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downewards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne under Armesefmianum, and Israel delivered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name: one was thought to have flourished either as a king, or a wife man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable workes: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Cherres was king, who was drowned in the Red Sea: Secondly, the places Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Bafiris and all his children, than of one King alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostate, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeares old: Ramefles, which was this Armesefmianum, being then King of Egypt. After Ramefles, Amenophis reigned 19. yeares: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already layed open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly over-passe.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. 1.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

RUC it is that the History it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations upon S. Augustine citeth very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But if he did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the fame is contrary to all Stories Divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolemy a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Amasis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greece History, the first Booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though he cite some authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians: and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermotides. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo compunctissimus, is called Musaeus Iudeorum. Eusebius in his Chronology, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amasis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphereus, governed Affyria, Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criafus the Argives; that then (Sesofstris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if we beleeve S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxi Modes ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecrops Athenienfium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this fort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt: best proved. S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne, Saphrus governing Affyria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeares; his successor Mamelus 30. yeares; Spartus after him 40. yeares: in whose fourth yeare Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Afcataides followed Spartus, and held the Empire 41. So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Affyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criafus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Affyrian Saphrus: for take one yeare remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeares of Ma- melus, and the 40. years of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops his 50. years: then taken nine yeares out of the reigne of Afsarader, who years of Cecrops his 50. years: those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left was Sparetus succellour, those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Egypt: and adde these nine yeares to the three yeares of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but four yeares of Cecrops his 50. and so it falleth right with S. Angustinus words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were opprest in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeares, or rather more after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 62. years: some of which time, and 80. yeares after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keepe them under with burdens: and they build the Cities, Pitbom and Ramafes, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serve; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: even from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth yeare of Moses, and untill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story; or elsewhere in the Scripture.

THis City which the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built seven yeares after Hebron, Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremy; the Septuagint, Tanis; Iosephus, Protatidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis, Hegeppus, Thamna; and William Tyrrinus, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Ensebius our of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did reside in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Ensebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Heliopolis, Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On, and Ptolomy, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trajan, was the same which Vatablus & our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrrinus in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahabeth; and Simon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onia, the high Priest of the Jewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternal God; nor much inferior to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomy Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeares after the foundation by Onia, whom Iosephus falsely reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of Isay c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Egypti, in that day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Jewes, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountain

Gen. 12. 15.
Isay 19. 11.

tainie is still found, called Iesus well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Esay and Ezechiel, the same which Herodotus calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoining, so called; which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis, and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Ma'zer. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis Mixaim. Pelufium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call G. Tyrrid. 1. 30. c. 57 Sai; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damietta as Gul. Tyrrinus winnetheth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrrinus) quae olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bobastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pihah.

To make the story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Heliopolis or Behbesmes, Balfebon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Story. For all story without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the reader; neither doth anything serve to retainne, what we read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driven to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arian Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res geste narrentur, aut sine Topographica cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; si narratio (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation and education.

BUT to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: inasmuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Divell, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soon as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que praeant (saith Comestor) multitudinis obsteritium, who had command given them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two (before named) were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diversly disputed. S. Angustine calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulenfis, and Petrus beleeve them to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with piety, and the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his very King's pleasure; Josephus giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrewes there should be borne a child, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a means, contrary to the lawes of heaven and of nature) he stretched out his bloudy and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall Kingdome of Christ, as if it should have bene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the first of Exodus: Come, let us worke wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be war, they join themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearely beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous workes taken out of Nilus, being therinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, and sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princeesse having beheld the child his forme and beauty, though but yet in the blouthe, so pierced her compassion, as she did not onely preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equal care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were, extrañus or eruptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or after Josephus and Glycerus, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and Hes, as much to say, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, & by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, presertim ei sapientibus Egyptiorum Magistris, quibus eruditur, sicut Basil; unto whom she gave princely education, appointing over him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Josephus and Philo) he excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Sixtus Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the reigne of Joshua.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastoral life; and that of Paterius of the Bookes of Genesis and Job.

When Moses was grown to mans estate, Josephus and Eusebius out of Arianus, tell us of ten years war that he made against the Ethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyse, called Meroe; and how he recovered that City by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comenius a pretty tale of Moses. How after the end of that war, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skillfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her husband; and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeares of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Country to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknowne unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheeps, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianites, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country nearest Egypt, fittest to returne from; necessary to be knowne, because interjacent betwene Egypt and Judaea, through which he was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over; and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble shepherd, sitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poore beasts only.

Egyptian

In that part of Arabia neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeares. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart he enjoyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the trouble some affaires thereof, he gave himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeares had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (sicut Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gravis mansuetis. Quemadmodum bellicosus ingenia praerexcent in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perficere sunt; huius in praebentibus materiam exercituum, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefector a mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; adeoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contumelia sed honoris gratia: The art of keeping sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdome, namely, the rule over men, the most gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over subjects; therefore Kings are styled shepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Job, as Paterius supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Paterius opinion, That Moses while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Booke of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Paterius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of this calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the marvailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the eternall: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment.

ment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Una est Dei & sola natura que verè est: idem quod subsistit, non habet aliquid, sed sum est. Cetera que creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit: It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not bene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the divine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inani, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse than nothing, and mere vanity.

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Rivers into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applyed: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast; and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps; by the death of their Cattle; by leprous Scabbies; by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer, than the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his own first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood upon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reserving their bestiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels, of his own people: of which (the feare being past) he suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Paschever, (a Sacrament of the most clean and unpotted Saviour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the pole and lintell of the doors; the Angel of God in the night smote every first-borne of Egypt, from the son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the Paschever; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only marke their Sheep and Cattle, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despite of himselfe. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desert of Etham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children and Cattle, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the meane while having gathered gather all the Chariots of Egypt, and 6000. of his owne, and Captaines over them; he determined to set upon them in the plaines of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines used against the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrewes might joyn themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforce him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise; and Josephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on fixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattle and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his Enterprizes: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becomming a Wise man, and a valiant and skillfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death, well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Paschever, he appointed a general Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramases in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gave commandement, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Pasts, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Deserts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fiftenth day of the Moneth Abib: which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the year. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their year in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their policke year, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, unto the beginning, middlest, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in every Moneth, and the whole forme of their year, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeares space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew year: with the difference betweene them and other Nations in ordering the accompt of time.

VE Adar was an intercalary Moneth, added, some yeares, unto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lunary yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by calling the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not have so bin kept, if either the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bin found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, and to asertaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeares unquall, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeares required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made up a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough, even to the most savage of all people, when a yeere hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeares insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men observed the Monethly conspicuous revolution of the Moone, by which they divided the yeere into two parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those again into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. dayes or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteene yeares, every moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelve Moneths, and as many dayes more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sunne and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole dayes; neither did the Moone change alwayes at one houre; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Here lay much Wisdome and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeere to consist three hundred and sixty dayes, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. Thus 360. dayes filled up the Grecian yeere (besides many collateral proofes) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalerens, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeare exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neither did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeares, in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupy their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatomban (which answereth in a manner to our June) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might ever begin with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of every yeere; those Games being held once in four yeares. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Zadromion; (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunary yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of June would every yeere have growne colder and colder, had they not fought to keepe all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere, one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. dayes, & so successively through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neare as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these markes which they observed, were found at length to be deceifull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeares intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeares intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19. yeares, wherein the Moone having 235. times runne our her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past she had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoyded the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had bin used; for by the intercalation of 7. moneths in the 19. yeares, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived; was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle containing four of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeares; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Caesar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the yeere unto the forme which is now in use with us, containing 365. dayes and six houres, which houres in four yeares make up one whole day; that is intercalated every fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian yeere by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added unto the worke of Caesar; yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aquinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten dayes sooner found, in that time Pope Gregory strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moveable Feasts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had bin. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundredth yeere, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sunne doth not in his yearly course take up full fixe houres above the 365. dayes; but faileth by many minutes, as in 400. yeares make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 29. yeares, which the Hebrewes used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing up the dayes of the whole year, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone; and because that day was festiual, they were very carefull as well to observe the short year of the Moone, passing through all the 12. Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that every two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made up 7. Moneths in 19. yeares; to 6. of which 7. were commonly given 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeares were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moone were found on the same day of the year, month & weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had beene at the beginning of it 19. yeares before.

Divers have diversly set downe the forme of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigomius tells us, that every second yeare they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; every fourth yeare a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeare of the Sun. But herein Sigomius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes: and therefore to have added so many dayes to the end of the yeare, had bin the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeares following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that every third yeare, or second yeares, neede required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeares end unto the other 12. This I beleeve to have bin true; but in which of the yeares the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they doe not probably deliver, who keepe all far from evenesse untill the very last of the 19. yeares. For (to omit such as are grossely) some there are who say, that after three yeares, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeare; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were, in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the first yeare; at which time, besides the Intercalary Moneth, remained six dayes, namely, three mounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeares, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeare; at which time they have 18. dayes in hand, all which with the Epact of the 19. yeare, make up a moneth of 29. dayes, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirme nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeare every Moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. dayes, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeare and more; which inconvenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more convenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeare. For the 6. dayes remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixt yeares, added unto the 22. dayes arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeares, doe fitly serve to make up a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeare following; and this borrowing of two dayes is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpe to make the yeares ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of every Moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeares, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse than to goe out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two natural, the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe over those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Ramesses from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horie and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, onely wise he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the successe upon his owne understanding, wife conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pibacheroth, 16. miles distant; and fate down between two ledges of Mountaines adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountaines of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagins noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specula, sive custodia, Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians beleeved, or at least made their slaves beleeve, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Egyptii dii secundi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower asleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pibacheroth, betweene the Mountaines, which made a streight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gave sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wash of the Sea: inasmuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoved them most to have taken courage for their owne defence, laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisdoms, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

BUT Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him, using this comfortable and resolved speech: Feare not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seene this day, ye shall never see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on in these words: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speake unto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, to goe forward; and let the children of Israel goe on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voyce of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands uncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heeles, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behinde them; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, it such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any hamfull speed. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas returne, hasted himselfe towards his owne Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moved by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with unresistable fury & swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with feare of death, ran one achwart another, and mistaking the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus upon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda first made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe unto thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Hosea condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the Defart, and, as we now call it, led the Vantgard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalm: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts; and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit mare rubrum in divisiones, He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a Greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written Psalm 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy wayes: and in the last booke of Wisdom, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chencres, perished in the 16. year of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waies. But as Philostrophus in his third booke noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreteth at a narrow strait, betweene Araba the Happy and Aethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Protony calleth Possadium, to the other Land of Aethiopia, hath not above fixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Aethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses pass, is called Heropolites of the City Hero; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisus, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeares. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, & Eant. Aricmidorus writes it Elaniticum: King Juba Laniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port & Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Prolemy, Elana; Plinie, Lena; Josephus, Ilana; and Marius Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalab in Assyria, to which Salmanassar carried the Israelites captive, 2. Kings 18. v. 11. which Ilalab in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elia: and in the first of Chro, the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diversly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of *Mahomet*s Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythreus: and because Erythras in the Greece signifieth Red: hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythras, the sonne of Persus and Andro Arian de geff, meda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius conjectureth: which Arian Alex. Mag., Strabo confirm. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discovery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander under Gama (which discourse I gave Master Richard Hakluyt to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagua, some time Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, & cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serve for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, give a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, & elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing under water may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadows of these stones, sands, earth, & cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Johannes Barro in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion-Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which wasseth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. have nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and streighten it so fast, as for six miles together it is not above three miles over; from thence upward the land on Egypt side, falleth away, and makes a kinde of Bay or Cove for some ten miles together, after which the land growes upon the Sea againe, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses pass, it over, though others would have it to be over against Elana or Toro, but without judgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses pass over in three dayes: and betweene the land of Egypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is above 80. miles. For Ramases, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharao at Zaan, and tooke his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude; and Meigdoh, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a halfe, which made a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low Ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrews have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, upon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so farre, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleeve not therein, periwadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason unto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now, Moses entering the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tyde) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water ten or twelve miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past, who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had bin by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on betweene two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise Pharaoh by any returne of waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have beene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backely a strong East-winde, doe rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but in effect North and South. And it must have beene a West and North-west winde, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof, the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being unknowne to Pharaoh: while he was checkt by that Sea which used in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and over-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he over-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being employed by Pharaoh, and wannedivers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossefesse, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there winne upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaird altogether of their safetie: and when Moses prayed unto God for helpe, he was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speake unto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves, that there was not at the time of Pharaohs approach any ebbe at all; but that God did divide and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Smes discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path, not that the waters stood upright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgement, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes & refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Country, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary returne of the flood before they could recover their own Coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast ashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Origen, in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of somethings touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUt to goe on with the story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeare of the World 2434. saphrus then governing Assyria; orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Criosus the Argives; Orus Egypt, and Decalion Thessalie. He fled into Midian when he had lived 40. yeares, in the yeare of the World 2474. and two yeares after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis, verse nineteen, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites & Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembered, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Cadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sones were borne; which he did (referring my selfe to better judgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neer the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her & his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 120000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wives kindred inhabited; seeing himselfe comming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. years.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar & Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. & 4. v. 18. & c. 1. 8. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Nam. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Law.

THe rest of the monthes of this year 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai & Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of King 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachi 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. Which heardeſt (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are dis-joynted at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: whom the year 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumes, of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almost a yeare, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he staid a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelve daies: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeare; and he arrived about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being given the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and use thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way dis-joynted, he may turne over a few leaves, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, levell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfulllest mean (his miraculous grace excepted) to governe that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North Starre is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haven of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very finewes of every Estate in the world, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion: a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedamonians, and the Athenians, received their Lawes from one: as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedamonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwayes taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sense used. For if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandmentes of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also usurp that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Woe unto them that say so, decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though evill and unbeneficent: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuaria posita est; it is an evill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or evill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Divines call Legem somiti, is to be understood. For every law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according unto it: in which sense as elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captive unto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclination of all creatures are sometime called Lawes, so far as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himselfe (while he hopeth to abuse the world by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne soule, by crafty unrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefcit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of them, colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tibi, cum; maxime omnium verere te ipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to others, nor to thine owne heart: but above all men reverence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to give heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, is heaptly moved to those things which his proper forme presenteth unto him: to that which right reason offereth, and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue; and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1.

Job. 28.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liveth thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to move, and to give light, and to serve for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes; the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Cain perceive his owne wickednesse and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him againe. And that this judgement of well and evill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written, Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doe not well, sinne lieth at thy doore.

The Schoolmen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being openly amply by Reimerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this subject.

Tim. 9. 9. 4. 12.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly; and not habite, as it is an evident naturall judgement of practique reason: they divide into inemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and evill shunned) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more universall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evill (as of the first, to desire to live, and to shunne hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first inemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no prooffe, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shunne evill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the 44. Psalme approveth: Recte quidem Bonum definiunt, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

Eccle. 1. 4. 1.

The

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to us, as we have sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so it meete, even by the Law of nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath given divers Lawes unto them: In which sense the Civilians define Naturall right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures; Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of every Law. For so they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures: In this place (saith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Jus natura, the other Jus gentium: the Divines understand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason, both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and divisions of this law of nature answering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary; secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and illavoyded: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this Law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the law of nature increaseth; Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adveniente mandato, peccatum revocatur; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. Paul, When the Commandement came, sinne revived. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by Saint Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not convenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting, and the like: yet it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore, said Damasene; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contrarium est; Men (saith he) are made evill, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: and Saint Augustine, Omne vitium natura necat, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Rom. 2. 15.

L. 1. Fidei lib. 2.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so straight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evill, and giving to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of justice and equity.

And though the Law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law the suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the universall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot denie himselfe.

§. VII. of the written Law of GOD.Aug. de Civit.
Dei. lib. 1.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Divine and Humane. Again, the divine positive law is double; the Old and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeare, whereas Asiatades or Afades governed the Affrians, Marabius the Sycionians, Triops the Ar-Gives, Cecrops Attica, & Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Gracians: no nor Homers time, who lived after the fall of Troy 800. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was built downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingrave in stone, that it might remaine a lasting book of his exprest will in the Church: & that the Priests and people might have wherof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: & that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written Law, instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now, length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, & evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor to expound divine worship, as for those after ages was required, who gave every day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, & set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not, read in their own consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, inquire the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, wherof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giving wisdom to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the divine law writes, forbiidden every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our soules, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente discernantur: The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversitie of opinion, & difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, we cannot be assured of, but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said David, This is the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giving Wisdom to children.

§. VIII.
Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarks by Tradition.

Now, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written Law, the world & people of God were left altogether to the law of reason & nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarks of the first Age received many precepts from God himself, & whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph and Moses. Yea many particular Commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosomes of their Priests, and unlawfull to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the Patriarks, and from them delivered to the posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamab, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That naturall and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and justice interposing betwene the untaught, and revenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried up from the earth: Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we finde that the unnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heaven. The sinne of Adulterie and Ravishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge, taken for Dina: forcing: and by the judgement which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and uncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and divers other constitutions, partly Morall & partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not only to have bin written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance to have bin given in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so ever the Law naturally preceded, & went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of unwritten law; the Angels intuitively; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Judicall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not away is one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

Now as the word (Law) in generall, as is afore said, hath divers significations, & is taken for all doctine which doth prescribe & restrain to the laws, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly; as sometime for all the old Testament, Now we know what sever the law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law. When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of us in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

Rom 6: 4. When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summu[m] ius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace. In the former sense, it is used, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken

Romē 6:
Gal-3:18.

the Law, but under Grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Chriff, and the like : then it signifieth but this, dowes & figures ; as, The Law was given by Moſes, but grace & truth came by Jeſus Chriſt,

John 1. 17. Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifieth the whole people
Gal. 3. 23. of the Jews: Common wealth; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law.
Luc. 1. 6. Or the Law of the order & institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets
Heb. 7. 12. & the Law, or the Priests prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law
10. 1. of service of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymy, for Interest, Authority, or Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

Rom. 8.2.
Rom. 7.13.

the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of conscience &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness, and Justice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to S. James, Whoſoever ſhall keepe the whole, & faileth in one point, he guilty of all. The definition used by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old & New law are comprehended, is thus given. Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte perveniant ad supernam beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humane vite finis: i.e. The divine law positteth ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humane vite finis; i.e. The divine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

James 2. 10.

The Moral, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall. The Morall

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evill to be avoyded, in particular; as also it declareth, for whole sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of divine service, and of holinesse; (the externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jewes, and prescribeth orders for justice and equiry. And therefore was it said of S. Paul, The Commandement is just, holy, and good: just, or justice being referred to the Judiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Judiciall part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place, or persons.

The Ceremoniall is divided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Paschever, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyinges, annoyntings, and attire, as not to weare mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and improper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Ass, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty even to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some reference these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first fruit of the tree, nor muzzell the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is their any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moralliveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away : saving in the ability of justifying or condemning ; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God ; and to use charitable one towards another: which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for feare of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liveth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christs, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient : though in a farre fewer number than before Christs coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judiciall liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and univerrall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of justification, the Ceremoniall as touching the use and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudicial is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

§.X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall confideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The sense and understanding of the Law.
9. The duration and continuance thereof.

i. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three attributes are referred as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall.

2. The Majesty of the Lawgiver is approved in all his creatures: who as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he onely gave the Law, who could onely give the end & reward promised, to wit, the salvation of mankind: but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gave the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and distinguished: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed: not unto his feedes, as to Eſau & Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel ſingularly, of whom Chriſt. Now to Abraham and his feedes were the promiſes made: be ſaith now to the ſeed, as ſpeaketh of many due to thy ſeed, as of one, which is Chriſt.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time between the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moſes: the Law written in the Commandments received by Moſes in the worlds year 2514. continued to the Baptiſme of John: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which ſhall continue to the worlds end. Other reaſons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to:

Galath. 4.

Heb. 9.

Gal. 3.

or signe of our Justification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were finnes forgiven, who take away the finnes of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and justify. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and the sacrifice of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could justify, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

The Old and New Testament differ in name, & in the meane & way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the Olde by works, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or object & remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse & salvation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New is of more excellencie, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever durin.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chiefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chiefe part thereof is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyfull, happy, & prosperous message, or (as Homer useth) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in general, as in Elay the 52. verſe concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most joyfull message of Salvation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we understand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are divided in volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation; to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousness and justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end, even the salvation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke & hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, & pledges to assure the Fathers of thole spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, & pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them a farre off, and beleaved them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine, omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes

Cap. 11. v. 13.

Ebr. de Civitate Dei. l. 1. c. 11.

attendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promissi: Few (saith he) do understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly, eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noloit Deus pascere in Sophon. cap. 2. Judaeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibique, ut Judaei formant; God would not feed the Jewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves drame. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deus; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things; that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future: to wit, the safety of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodness, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

The agreement between the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sin & misery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and salvation: to which the Law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin & misery, God sheweth his mercy & salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the Law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousness by works, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth: Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex qua non sanaretur (saith Saint Augustine) sed qua agrotantes probaret; The Law was given, not to helpe, but to discover sicknesse: and Saint Chrysostome; Data est lex, ut se homo inveniret, non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaereretur: The Law was given that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the Physician. For Christ came to save the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seventh consideration is of the end, and use of the law: which is to bring us to Christ: for finding no righteousness in our own workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousness, & to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Lex est, quae curat, sed non sanatur: the law is the physician, but it does not cure: it is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing to perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or false obedience: but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law, is, as hath bin said, to send us to Christ, and his grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearefull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and use of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirm the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The use of the Judiciall, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we must conforme our selves.

The sense and understanding of the Law is double, littéral and spirituall: by the littéral we are taught the worship and service of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being untill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Crosse, coming

Gen. 4. 10. The Scripture shall not depart from you, nor a Law-giver from between his feet, untill I bring the Crosse, coming these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness. From which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so effectually by reason of our frail affections: and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coveting reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For Concupiscencia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any natural frailty, or unadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts; that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme us not: as they say, Quamdiu refragmur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some that they hurt us not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in the tenth precept, but what hath beene forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it breake not our into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so even the Morall Philosopher can tell us, that the Continent man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the Continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his evil desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth unto them: yet such a man, even according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continencia, not to be vertue, but only a degree unto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithfull endeavours to keepe his commandments, we witness our love toward himselfe: we may not safely give libertie to our vanities, by casting backe upon God (who is justice it selfe) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keepe. For, as he is accused (saith Saint Hierome) that avowes that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; accursed is he that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keepe the Law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, doe our faithfull endeavours to observe them: which if we doe unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings: There is no man that sineth not. And againe, Who can say, I have made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne without deliberation; let every mans conscience, judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himselfe in all that he can see, or no: For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon paine of losse of his love, to performe some service: if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his Sovereign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

6. XIII.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

And if we consider advisedly and soberly of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his people, it will appeare that such was his merciful providence in the choice of them, as were there neither paine nor profit adjoynt to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeavours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and every State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burden, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his owne travaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by justice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of savages. And hereof making our humane reason only Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations, which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receive thence from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his holy name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giveth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requieth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect us, when our aged yeares require comfort and help at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say unto himselfe; This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeavour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families: murders and poysonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and every man subject to most filthy and uncleane diseases.

If theft and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the salvages, by rootes and acornes. For no man labourereth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourfold, police of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the careful and painfull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and justice thereby banished out of the world.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringerh no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we doe but cover; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours; we can looke for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living: Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and provident God ordaine them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and unwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two: (1.) Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores; & he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae; to be customes approved by antiquitie, or unwritten Lawes. Now custome differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by use and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars: the first are written customes, received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundy and Normandy, the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Cassili, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customes, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or National customes are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customes are feldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The Customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Countie of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever use and time hath made these customes as lawes; yet ought every custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractus temporis quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; Tunc quod ab initio non est in bono, non potest in bonum transire; Tunc quod ab initio non est in bono, non potest in bonum transire; Tunc quod ab initio non est in bono, non potest in bonum transire. Course of time amends not that which was naughty from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law divine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custome which is against the law, had his beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they have beene since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius, qui novam legem & novam consuetudinem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est. The people cannot bring in a new custome against Law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the advisement of wise men, and the restraint of offences committed; either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fitt for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall and etternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publike authority; prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mibi lex esse non videtur, quajusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not just; and just it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and etternall. For there is no Law just and legitimate, (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the etternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines derivaverunt.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kinde soever. For it falleth otherwise under the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniquae constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so every particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publike authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth all humane actions. And so is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de adulterio, alia Cornelia de Sicariis; The Law of Julian against Adultery, is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, divided into the Law of Nations, and the Civill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for every Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Aliphan understands it: for he defineth Jus gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sententia, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which National Law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers estates is also divers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately derived from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Aliphan, Jus civile, neque in totum a naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: itaque cum aliquod addidimus vel detrahimus Juri communi, Jus proprium id est, Civile efficitur; The Civill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought so, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Civill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Civill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeares after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Roman customs & Lawes Regall. The Regall Lawes were divided by the first Kings; & called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquin then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were aboli-

a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

Philos.
ff. de Leg.

Tibi soli peccavi, saith David; Against thee only have I sinned: therefore, the Prince can not be said to be subject to the Law; Princes non subiacitur legi. For seeing, according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but *quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativæ non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pervenit; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend its self kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend its self to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his own self, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his own self, be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the Law: ergo etiam potest ipsismet Princes sine legislatoris voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker as his owne will and pleasure, deliver himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: *Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis, Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Greg. de Valentia de Leg.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, That we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told us that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their severall qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to governe aply, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman civill Lawes did indeed containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much unto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion, or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious; want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeves) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, we thinke it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted), than because they were consonant unto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where even the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the Law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evill, which forsooth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wife and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

28. 19.

To this effect it is well observed by Master Doctor Waller, that the morall Judicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatively that we are tyed to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde unto it to make the burden more heave: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speake any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes beene very plausible. And surely howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equall satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Herof, perhaps, that Judge could have beene witness, of whom Fortescue saith, that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes, doth speake, complaining of a judgement given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a year after being convict for the same offence, confest that his Multis was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented: but this Judge, such the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animam ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret, Hic himselfe often confessed unto me, that he should never during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgment which other Sciences yeeld unto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being; is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well saith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium se vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit eternam, de qua nulli animo judicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power given to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay abetter, or another foundation than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law to the death of Moses.

S. 1.

Of the numbering and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God in this ordering of their troupes.

When Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having scene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in every Tribe, from 20. yeares of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The their conquest, besides the beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bowls, amounting unto 2400. sheckles of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cups, to 120. sheckles of gold; which makes of sheckles of silver 1200. every sheckle of gold to 120. sheckles of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundred and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passeover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second moneth of the second year; as on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: Rise up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their incamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Naashon, taking the Vantage-guard, followed by Nathanael and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many desarts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing unforeseen, thought which might serve for the advancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan: promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great understanding & judgement (as appeared by the Counsell he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeares and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeares before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had lived 40. yeares in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of soules; which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seem by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is evident, that he went back from Moses into his owne Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that his returne to his owne Country, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his owne Country, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

After this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the Desarts of Paran, and after three daies wandering, they fate down at the Sepulchres of lust, afterward called Taberna, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiniers and Murmurers which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second year, they rested and fed themselves with Quailles (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to call up on them) to the 24. day of the third moneth; to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or June: whereof surfeiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thammuz, answering to our July, they went on to Hazeroth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven daies, after whose recovery Israel removed towards the border of Idumaea, and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Rivers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel, whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernesse (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gave them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giant-like, (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearful stature, and so farre over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grahhoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to chooſe them a Captaine (or as they call it now adays, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soule of the whole multitude (Josua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountain foot of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaved both of reason and common sense, they threatened to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayors of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glory betweene the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction, of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which he had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alleging, that this so severe a judgement, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Desarts. Yet as God is no lesse just than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heavey than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity; so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to performe his promises, which have never been frustrated.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the returne.

Now when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavey displeasure towards them, they began to bewaile themselves, though overlate: the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the advice of Moses; who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword, which God had hitherto benedicted and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entered Judaea before their enemies were prepared and joyntly did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ranne head-long and without advice into the mountaines of Idumaea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites in revenge of their former losse, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their plantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painfull passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea againe: in which retreat before they came backe to passe over Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeares; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Jehua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborne and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the returne of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch; and the Host of Heaven. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Num. 33:

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Fraternity there found. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and fare downe at Respha, neere the foot of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the Wild, and incamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses, alwayes keeping the Valley between two great ledges of mountains, (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharao) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Saphir, or Sepher: this making the twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceleth; and then to Thabab, and so to Thara or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the Earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvelles and judgments of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth with their families and goods; even while they sought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-weal of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the twelve rods given in by the Heads of the twelve Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron on that of Levi, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable spirit, and having laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buds, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moferoth, (or Masrit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moferoth to Benejacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Madian and Esfongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Esfongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Hierodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the stone, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants convey water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia releeveth the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Jotabab, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Esfongaber, or Elosh, I cannot beleve, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Esfongaber: which City in Josephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes, Efsia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Elosh on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Esfongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travailed in that passage.

It seemeth that Esfongaber or Afongaber, Elosh and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, neere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esfongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present bin subject unto the Idumeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places: for it is said; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumaea, into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that he made a Navie of shippes in Esfongaber besides Elosh, in the Land of Edom.

Num. 20:22.

1 Kings 11:12.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esfongaber he turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Berob, of the children of Jacan; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth year, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Esfongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe avoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their bodies in the Desarts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumaea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the byting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Calestria, encamped at Zalmone: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journeyes by the edge of Idumaea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonsca) per viam qua habet a latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went awhar the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea; that is, to Esfongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboith; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Supha, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountours of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having pass that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad; & from thence they kept the way to Diblatshaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblatshaim, the fame which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblatshaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betwene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblatshaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Country: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he undertooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words, When thou comest neere unto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Num. 21. v. 24.

Now concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this Story to that Booke intituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things rememmemorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, & in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zob, and the brookes of Arnon, Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevian & Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Supha Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solet in recessione bellorum Jehova, contra Vahchum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the battailes of Jehovah, against Vahch, in the Country of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understandeth, that amongst the wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vahch, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vahch was the immediate predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vahch. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Booke of Judges. Syracides c. 46. tells us plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Josua; Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have bin destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever they have bin in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaeus, and cited by Origen and Jerome, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembered by Josua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Josher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the midst of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David took the precept, of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalme, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them be parton of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinke, that David by this Booke understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Josua, by an unknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 19. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceives that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, whomet with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the sonne of Salomon; as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Isaiah the Seer; remembred in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. With these have the bookes of She-maiab and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Jehu the sonne of Hanani, of theacts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hafcirim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this divers others of Salomons works have perished, as his Booke of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Iosephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Cicero, Apulianus, Picinus, Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Askelans many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hiernsalem. But let us returne thither where we left.

§. VII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

When Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side therof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient & best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battaile, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciendly posselt by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummins. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountaines of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also bin Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims; and their chiefe City was Arer or Arneer the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummins; which were of the famous ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendiq; Giantes; Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not farre to the North of Arer.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being encamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Yabeb the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two & fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hastning himselfe, they encountered each other at Jabok: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory for pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and defended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basaniens also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judaea, being at this time, and after this victory at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Tracennitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the onely man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying betweene the Mountaine of Hermion (which Mountaine, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Sbirion, and the Amorites Shemir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the Mountaines of Abarim, left the prosecution of that warre unto Jair the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse posselt the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountaines of Gilead adjoining, was given to Reuben and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

After these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the love of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever bin inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by Num. 25. 9. his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pieced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindeesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes, became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprife, Num. 26. 7. 51. he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which companies of 12000. Num. 31. 7. 81. Moses gave the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately bin, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Josuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Sehon saith Josuah. He slew also the men, male-children, and women: saving such as had not yet used the company of men, but those they saved, and dispierced them among the children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120. yeares, making both his owne weaknesse of body knowne to the people, and his inability to travaile: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereonto render up his life: He hastned to settle the Government in Josua: whom he perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his later dayes after the Conquest of Og, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people: which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirme them in knowledge, love, feare, and service, of the all-powerfull God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simon expected, with severall and most comfortable blessings: praying the greatnesse and good-Deut. 33. 11. 12.

ness of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that he indited was that Prophetickall Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens and I will speake, and let the Earth heare the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrowes of this life, unto that rest which never afterward hath disquiet, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the year of the World 2554.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have bin mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for accepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall finde that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruell and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortall men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's owne daughter, to preserve that childe, which afterward became the most wife, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he fought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceived of the injuries, and the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to flie into Madian: the contention betweene the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father; who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters, and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heards-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to live many yeares, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeares after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Josua, with the summe of the History of Josua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have Warre, were divers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

LIKE manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward, we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by prolesse of time divided into severall Families and names: wherof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummins, or Zuzi, Enims, Horites, &c. others These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them; especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possit themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Edomites, and Ammonites: of Esfau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Israelites, with whom are joyed as of the same Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have bin a Tribe of Edom, because Esfau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth

* It seemeth also that Huz, the Sonne of Nachor, and Ber, his Brother, planted themselves in the East side of Jordan, about Basan: where they finde the Land of Huz, in which Jub dwelt as one of the issue of Huz, the Sonne of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend which is called a Bacit. See hereafter ch. 10. §. 7. Exod. 17. 16.

Deut. 11. 5.

vinceth it to have bin otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathe. Now even as Abraham besought God to bleesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tigris, and Sar which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these latter named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because to all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to joyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrewes a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately bin beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, & the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to intermingle Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Balaam, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefaces of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incited by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdain from the elder in name to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might seeme to give place, much lesse to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, Princes of Idumæa, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

Gen. 15.
Gen. 27.
Gen. 33. 14.

Gen. 26.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite; and the other Abolihamah, the grand-child of Zibem the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceffe of time corrupted, & drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§. II.

§. II.

of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysiest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Gen 34. Hevites, whom Siméon and Levi slew, together with his son Sichem, in revenge of their sisters ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumæa.

Numb. 21. 14.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea or Nabathæa, and thrust them over Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses overthrow in the plaines of Moab: at which time hee slew Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Numb. 21. 24.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountaines Tracuni or Galaad and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fift was Adoni-Zedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Josua nameth foure other Kings.

Biham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Jarmuth.

Japhia, King of Lachis: and Dibor, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrowne in battell; and hanged by Josua. After this overthrow Josua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Jabin, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor be- foretime was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adoni-Zedek that notorious Tyrant is named: who consent that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feete of seventy Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes under his Table: who, after Juda and Siméon had used the same execution upon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

Judas Josephus
lib. 5. cap. 14.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Josua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years, after the death of Ehud. He inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Debra) overthrow; and his Captaine Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, nailed driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathæa: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abraham's sonne, by Cethura, Raguel surnamed Gehelegem or Gehelem, saith Josephus; called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jecanis, or Jekham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Midianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were there:

- Notes:

Zalmunna.
After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven yeares: till they being pur to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in Judges 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuite of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands upon Zebah and Salmunna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners, in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumaeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

both Eusebius and S. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur; of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of Wise. And domo: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientia pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had no meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno caelo quam longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discern a far off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this Mans knowledge Aescylus gives this testimonie.

*Alti agebant omnia
Ut forserebat: donec ipse repperit
Signorum obitus, ortusq; qui mortalibus
Sunt utiles: & multitudinem artium
His repperi: componere inde literas;
Matremq; Musarum auxi ego Memoriam
Perutilem cunctis, &c.*

But Fortune govern'd all their works, till when I first found out how Starres did set and rise:
A profitable art to mortall men:
And others of like use I did devise:
As letters to compose in learned wise
I first did teach: and first did amplify
The Mother of the Muses Memorie:

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, but 94. yeares after Ogyges. Phrygius sayes that he lived at once with Imachus, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Japetus, Aesculus findes two others, to wit, Occanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evenings, and so to the evening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hys, with the Sea adjoyning, tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse divine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere cælum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traditur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabule traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to beare up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified; unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Satan, as Rhea conjux Atme Prometheus. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction a fiction: and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries; and among them Eusebius and Saint Augustine, have not doubted; For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archas the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arcas Arcadia in Peloponnesus tooke name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone: Et Luna prior illa Ovid. de fast. l. 1. fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had bin any observation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that below the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iscariot Tetizes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lybia: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Phylosophy.

§. V.

of Deucalion and Phaeton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions, time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect every soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all man kinde drew on them that generall destruction by the flood universal. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vernie, of Justice and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

*Non ulla melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more just than he:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vestall, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall & decrease, I should verily thinke that Story had bin but an imitation of Noahs flood devised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen, of whom Greece that first the name of Hellas, & Melanthe, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Africa, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountaines of Vesuvius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likenesse of those things, which are amongst us: That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) a worth by Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

di. 1. 2.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words: the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judaeus, and Eusebius Caesariensis, and divided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Divine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish'd into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation measuring of grounds, was usefull unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Country being a leuell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, & operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie, teaching that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Starres have a certaine soverain heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets have their proper soules, &c.

The Divine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeve that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not known; that many of the Gods have bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their virtues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, have bin Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because under those Ensignes they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secrete, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Strom. 1.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three several sorts, viz. Epistolary, which is used in writing common Epistles; sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Horner participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropically, and Enigmatically. Imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropically or transferent, which applies the divers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Horner signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone by by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulnesse: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood: Enigmatically is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all divine things are Enigmatically and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have bin delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecrides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanbura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, unlesse he would acknowledge subjection: Idanbura returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their landes, were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Sovereigne Lord. But Xenophodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captives, Till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

Herod. 1.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus devised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of judgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menaeus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subject 3625. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aereall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certaine learned Philosophers into naturall Greeke, they seemed to have bin first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus Clem. Strom. 1. writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physicke fixe Bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrology foure.

6. VIII.

A Briefe of the History of Josua; and of the space between him and Othoniel: and of the remaners of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeare of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, tooke on him the government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the River of Jordan, and to possess, and divide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the rainge of Amynus, the eighteenth King in Affria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicily, when Darius governed the Argives; and Erithomius, Athens.

Josua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certaine discoverers to Jerico, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to passe over: Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Taverne or Viding-house, made Josua know that the inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egreffion, Josua removed from Sittim in the plaines of Moab, and drew down his Army to the bankes of the River Jordan; and gave them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the *Levites*ooke it up, and moved towards the River; giving them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters comming from above should stand still in a heape, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vantguard, which through all the Desarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the drie ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Jerico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Josua gave commandement, that all born in the last fortieth yeere in the Desarts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had bene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their removing from one place to another: Damasius, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; & now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrey, and having as it were, suted on Man, they parched of the Come of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse; about the fift yeere of his government; proved in the 14. of Josua v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes, at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own bookes, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Regals of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe have bene quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) joynted themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Josua. Only five (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, & Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance, whose Armie being by Josua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Josua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also tooke Makedash, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gether hastened, and perished. After which Josua posselt himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, when the South Countreies were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsailes of necessity, united themselves, to make one grosse strength & body of an Armie: which Jabin, King of Ha'or, practis'd & gathered together, by Josua discovered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them un-molt effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Ha'or only, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabite and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Josua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surpris. For he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Ha'or.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel past it with adrie foote; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Hornes; the showers of Haile-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fell after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke only proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Josua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeiters, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Josua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to be sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrey, in which travails their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have bin warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrells and bottels of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their Lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the commandment which he received from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put these men to the sword, and have sackt their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, fought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place. That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleev'd what they had said, and consulted not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshipers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they beleev'd not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himselfe by any evasion or distinction, Josua might justly have done it. For he needed your coast shall be from the wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar & Azab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth itselfe both over Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possesst, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Joshua: Behold, I have divided unto you by Ios these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

Deut. 1. 1. 2.

Deut. 1. 1. 2.

And though it be true that David greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreies give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting injoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent, which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possesse the Land, whither ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swore unto your Fathers; &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to doe, that is to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possesse great cities, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For saith he, Offendit promissionem principium non esse de hoc Politico regno: sed sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a civill Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he overthrow the reputation of the Jewes Story, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, & ad illam dantaxat orationem terram qua in caelis est; (that is) Only to that Land of the living which is in Heaven. Quamvis tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarum, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Iudeis occupata, sed tantum divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jewes is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Jewes never possesst, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem: where he hath these words De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina Regione petendam, quae totius Provinciae deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur suis: ita ut celestibus utatur pluviiis, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extruizione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festina verum struere tuis; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, & reg-

with craggy Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preferreth rain, & water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cisternes: thus this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders have hastened: so far S. Hierome; where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suggestionem terrae Iudeae, ut hereticus Sycopbant a mentitur: aut quo anseram historiae veritatem, quae fundamentum est intelligentiae spiritualis: sed ut decuriam supercilium Iudeorum, qui Synagoga angustias latitudinis Ecclesiae praeferrunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the Land of Iudaea (as the hereticall Sycopbant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jewes, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue further than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall sense, that Euphrates or Perah, which is made the East-bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet nevertheless that Hieromes opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perah were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise itselfe was never so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Aher, Negb, Galilee, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phoenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Aher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversly expressed, so that to the unskilfull they may seeme divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe think fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

† I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

The Asherites descended of Aher the Sonne of Jacob by Zelfa, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men above twenty yeares of age, and able to beare armes, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plains of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phoenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyle, and Wheate, besides the balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophetic, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Aher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

Scythians make Agenor the founder thereof: and Jufine derives the name from the abundance of fifh found on those fhores: whereof it hath bin called Zidona. But that was farre more ancient, Mofes, Joſaphat, and Joſephus witneffe, the fame being found by Zidon the eldeſt of *Canaan*s Sonnes: and ſo ſtrong it was in Joſeph's time, as neither did himſelfe attempt it, neither could the Aſſerites, or any of their ſucceſſors maſter it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Chriſt: ſo a little interchangeably governed, by their owne Princes or other Magiſtrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Eſay, Hieremie, Ezechiel and Zacharias, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies ſword, and by the peſtilence.

It was often amictued, both by the Phoenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the River Leontis, and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth betwene it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon & Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, faith Seignior: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weigshelm in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five & twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the Mappes and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor time there is no memorie : the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time confum'd and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre ; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon ; and a City subject to the Kings thereof : though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong : From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourish'd in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades : the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wife Zidonians. The Citty was both by nature & Art exceeding strong, having a Cattle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rocke, and compass'd by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order : and another Cattle it hath on the South side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies build'd that of Tyre, into places remote : as unto Tibes, and Sepoyra, Cities of Beotia in Greece. Strabo and Plinie give the Zidonians the invention of * Glasse, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, neere Prothomais or Acon : and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murano : of which S. Hierome and Plinie : Zidon infignis artifex vitris : Zidon vitraritis officinis Nobilis ; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilful worker in Glasse houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte b: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineas gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Kings 11. 5. in the story of Salomons Idolatry: where Astarte b is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said that he marrying Jezebel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshippeth their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astartes in their Idolatry they acknowledged: as it appears by the plurall names of Baalim & Astartes, 1 Sam. 12. 10. &c elsewhere: for even the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skillfull Hebrinian, is plurall: the singular being Aphreth: whence Judg. 2. 13. the Septuagint reads ἐκείνων τῶν θεῶν: They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, & Aphreths, may be diversly understood: either in respect of the diversitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtlesse in divers Cities divers. Augustine quæst. 29. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Cartaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the foundation to be Astarte: whom he makes to be borne of Tyrrus and Syria, and to have bene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius 2 Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Asarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreement that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride, that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammon: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the Milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had bintought by Moses & the Prophets so many yeares, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Was he to be Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon, at the day of Judgement, than for you.

 It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyr. But in the yeare of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeare 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Joppa: it was againe recovered, the commendement thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeare 1250. it was reeified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeare in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeare 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

†.III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, betwene it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing nere it: of which Sidonius :

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quaq; Sareptano palmita missa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocese of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Possellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of shippes commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterranean Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatneffe and power, the Tyrians erected Ursa, Lepcis, & Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyris tenerae Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore calld Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spainne they founded Gades, now Cadiz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the Iesse, Dromas Achilis, which Citie the Scholiasst of Apollonius placeth neere the River Phyllis, in Bythinia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosue the 19. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seemes, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrea Sar- rana, by which name Iuvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonic of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esfay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Tyras the sonne of Japhet to be the Parent thereof: and though the affinity of name was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esfay also witnesseth, Is not this no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esfay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Tyras the sonne of Japhet set himselfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to perswade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curius: and Josephus, and Eusebius make this City elder than Salomons Temple 240. yeares: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the wife of Age. Salomons Temple 240. yeares: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the wife of Age. nor gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Sea, as some read, or so others; in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mar of the people for many Iles: and Esfay, a Mar of the Nations: and so Proud, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esfay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufecture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Harcola Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Coquilis or Purpura, the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saying that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony. But this availed not: For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as notwithstanding that his materials were often wash away with the strength of the Sea and the Tydes, yet he never reited, till he had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their Walls, he over-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authours affirme) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Soldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provinciall Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Jaddas the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gazim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jewes being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his sonne in law Manasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guilt. Tyrians called Sanaballat, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three score shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve saile scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants five yeares, but with ill successe. And this sieg Menander E. Et cont. Ap. 1. 1. Guilt. Tyrians de Bell. Sacra. 13. 4. Joseph. ant. lib. 9. cap. 25. phelius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greece) adding, that Ethlaus, whom Tyrius called Helislaus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same fixe and twenty yeares. Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser, and about 200. yeares before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairfull worke, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeares, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, as every head was made bald, & every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esfay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end and after thirtene yeares sieg or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering over-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of shippes, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the cheblest of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie for many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof: as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine unto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Servants: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprize of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians have not bin silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician Histories, remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this Citie of Tyre, repaired and recovered it selfe againe: & continued in great glory about 300. yeares, unto the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeares: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierusalem onely, who within his owne Diocesse had foureteene great Cities, with their Bishops and suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Prolemaus, Sarepta, Zidon, Caesarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Arabis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Torup) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488. yeares.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guarmonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeares.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army, and fate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of shippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and fallied out resolutely upon his Army; slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeares after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfoordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, neere unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen garnished and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeares before before therein buried: but in the year 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turkes.

†. III.

Of Ptolomais or Acoz.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Asfer was Acoz, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acoz to the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Clandius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliouly wrestled from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphane: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomy not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabaus treacherously surpris'd & slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidioulnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander joyned, overthrown & treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomy: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three dayes, for God stricke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the port for safety and capacity not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the midst of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-Zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and fought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636. (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomar, the Saracen. In the year 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallis of Genoa: to whom a third of the renew was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore & seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossest and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated in which he was borne: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally have continued, should have borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or personified. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Asfer, to have bene in the fieldes of Libanus, betweene the River Adonis, and Zidon: his owne words are these:

these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant sacrum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamque mactata bestia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: & having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus saith Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodovicus Roman. Patric. Navigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Asfer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorically, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

†. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais & Tyre alongst the Seacoast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Achziph, and Josephus Ecdippas, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforsse findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, travailed as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asfer, which Rechob, as also Beroth, which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in David's time to the King Hadarbezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. 1 Sam. 13. 19. chap and 8. verse, and cap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Apeh it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seven and twenty thousand of Bennadab Soldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bin slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius findes that the Philistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Apeh there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to have bin in Juda. Of which Jos. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reades, Foriter, for, in Apeh, Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Apeh.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living Waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travaile till it recover the Sea, driveth sixe great Milles in that forth passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achfaph, or Axab, or after Saint Hierome, Acilapa: City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Jofia, at the waters of Merom.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Gifala, and some other places.

Further into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoining being very fruitful, & exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Asfer: where:

The

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoeus, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons horiorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Afer, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebos, or the Mountaine of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threecore miles distant.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF NEPH TALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephthalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephthalim, the sonne of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Desarts, there entered the Holy Lord of their sonnes 4500. besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty yeares of age. The Land of Nephthalim tooketh beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adjoining, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Afer, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephthalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and under Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountaines adjoining shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Posellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldaean Paraphrast; otherwise Bethshemes, or after the Latins, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis: The City of the Sunne: into which, faith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Geslens nameth Dealmarab: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Ibract, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoining to Nephthalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gave name to the Region adjoining, of which Lysanius the sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomie gave it the addition of Lysanii, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volateran nameth it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volateran is intitled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Prisillianus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the Tribe of Manasse, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephthalim, there is another City of the same name, saving that it is written with an Y for an N, and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachaba, and Hierome Bethmachaba. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake, it is written Abel Brth-Mabaca. (for belike it was the Towne of Mabaca, the wife of Macir, the sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called, Abel-Majim. This City Joab besieged, because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thercinto for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground: and therefore no marvell that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places tooke name; as Bethim, Judg. 2. 4.

stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedonim or Cadonim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorfeus by Casaria Palesina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joyning with Jordanus parvus which runneth from the Valley of Jephthach, which Josue reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI. THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

THE next adjoining Territory to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a City wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) tooke armes against Josue the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saying that his furie being quenched with the Rivers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceslion, or Cilbion, of the Levites, and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebes, Jos. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Jos. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Jarmuth, Jos. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Levites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboa take beginning: & range themselves to the Mediterran sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Jericho, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethphefs, or Bethpaffes, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe under those, Apher or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betwene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incouraged Achab, and were overthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness, boast himselfe as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glorie followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the yeare following, in the fields, as they say, adjoining to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which overthrow the servants and Counsaillors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should overcome them.

Under Apher towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esfrelon, in the plaines of Galilee; called also the great field of Esfrelon, and Mageddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Apher to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casalo, of which, 1 Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Levites; and Seftima or Shabassima, the West border of Isachar, of which Jos. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle, invironed with the Sea, sometime the store-house and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolonse.

From the Castle of Pilgrims the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthestmost

1 Chron. 6. 73.
Jof. 21. 29.

farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuise of his enemies, not at leisure, or perchance asleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessills of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoining.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North, standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porfina and Porphyrus, sometime a Snuffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Sea-coast towards Tiberias by the banks of Chifon, there are found the City of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widows onely sonne.

Then Seon or Shion, named Jos. 19. betweene the two Hills of Herman, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchantresse that undertooke to raise up the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anabarith and Rabbith, named Jos. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Jos. 21. 28. or Dobratba, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This Citie (which stretcheth it selfe over Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, neere the Caves of those two Theeves which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Herman, and on the other to the Valley of Jesrael: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, even to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboa on the South, & by Herman, and the River Chifon on the North. In these * plaines Gideon overthrow the Midianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims, Achab against the Syrians, and the Tatars against the Saracens.

§. VII. THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

THE next Tribe which joyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Josueph, the eleventh son of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Eutiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses, with his brother Ephraim, the grandchildren of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Pairiarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entered of their issues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Jesrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the lesse, and pierced into the South, to the uttermost of Calosyria, they built this Citie a new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians given by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northern people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jewes which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Cœlofryia: and Strabo joynes it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in arabie ad montes arabitena, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Jesrael neere Jordan: after that, Jordan strengtheneth it selfe againe into a River, leaving the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrary to all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Over the walls of this Bethsan the Philistins hung the body of Saul, and his sonnes slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbred by Tyrus, in his 14. Booke shop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbred by Tyrus. The later travellers and 12. Chapter: but the fame was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witnesseth the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

Hierom. in Epist.
ad Euseb. & in Loc. Hier.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transiitq; in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others reade venit incolomis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Salem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Ænon neere Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shalaim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word junius maketh to be the plural of Shulhal: of which we reade, 1 Sam. 13. 17. foras for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had bin as much as a Woman of this Salem, neere Ænon, it hath no probability.

This City Bezek by the place, Jud. 3. seemeth to have been in Juda.
Jos. 15. 6. 15.
1 Sam. 11.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezech the City of Adonibezec. Jos. 10. 10. here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Naab the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezech is the City of Bethbera or rather Beth-bia, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled downe and defaced; and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day: and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Aphon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jewes, and slaughtered, as Jos. 10. 10. numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomeus past by the Villages of the Jewes, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be men-enters and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West and on the border of Issachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Helsai the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Jos. 10. 10., though their King was afterward hangd, and their Citie given to the Levites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan than the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities; to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Jos. 10. 10. slew: which the Kings of Israel used for their Regall seats, till such time as Samar was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Asbia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece, Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a waighy stone, throwne by a Woman over the Wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others Judg. 9. ver. 53. set this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Arabata, of which the Territory adjoining is called Arabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies or Governments in Judea) for which Hierome, 1 Macc. 3. reade Arabatena: but in the Greeke it is Arabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Governour thereof. Jos. 10. 10. remembreth it often, as in his second Booke of the Jewes Wars, 6. 11. 25. 28. & elsewhere.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, & the other for a City with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarch is the same with Præfex in Latine, and Præfident in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome; and thereof so called. Plinie nameth severene Tetrarchies in Syria: Plin. 6. 15. the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Ulster, Connaught, and Mounster. Euseb. in Corin.

To the South-west of Arabatena they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, & Gabremmon of the Levites; but Junius out of Jos. 2. 1. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Jabbeham, Jos. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Jeziel a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Jeziel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end he might possesse his Vineyard adjoining to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Joan also was cast unburied into the same field: for which his Mother Jeziel murdred Naboth. 2 King. cap. 33.

Toward the Sea from Jeziel is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Abimelec King of Juda fled from Jeziel, when he had slaine Joan, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls it this Citie of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, neere unto which the good King Josias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a War unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof, by the commandement of God; whom Josias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; Jud. 1. 31. whose King was slaine among the rest by Josua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomeus calleth Chorfeus: & not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geographie of the twelve tribes; but the River which passeth by Mageddo, he understandeth to be but a branch, falling thercinto. Laicstan & Schroet make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, even to Sebastia or Samaria; and Strabo sette beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Jos. 15. 6. Jos. 15. 6. Palestina a Citie of Phœnicia, yea Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Gezer; Nigro seeing also Ptolomeus sets down Chorfeus for the partition of Phœnicia & Judea, this River running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomeus in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorfeus. The later travellers of the holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

† II.

Of Casaria Palestina, and some other Townes.

From Mageddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Casaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Sidon: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia; &

Gg

Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, & toward Egypt, betwene this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, and who therein laboured to exceed all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polisht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke over the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers & Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacite, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strenght of their Cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not bin found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fercht from far, and the weight of the stones was such as it exceedeth belife, I have added Iosephus owne words of this worke, which are these: *Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumdedit, quantum putares magne classis recipiendam sufficere: Et in viginti ulnarum prismatum, prae grandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque, pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodesim, altitudine novem-pedali: fuerunt quaedam etiam majora, minora alia: To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Iosephus) he compassed in a Bay wherein a great fleet might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fadome deepe: whereof some were fifty foute long, eighteen foute broad, and nine foute thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawfie of two hundred foute long, to breake the waves: the rest he strenghtened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the sonne in law of Cesar: in whose honour he intituled the Citie it selfe, Casaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelve yeares time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishopricke, commanding twentie others under it, saith Tyrim.*

Mac. 1. 13. 15.
Gal. 1. 23. 24.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Galasius to have bene Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: wherein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was herein two yeares prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cesar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennialia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angell unto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Casaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Jofua. But Junius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in traiibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Naphoth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Jofua call it Nephth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Jug. 1. 27.) may seeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Junius upon Macchab. 15. 11. placeth this betwene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the River Chorfeus: for so some name the River Chorfeus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strenght thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious willaine that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathans Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, usurping for a while the kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Dioecesse of Casaria.

From Casaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Gilgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they finde in these parts nemine the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Gilgal or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Jofua.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabeus overthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lievtenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Judea by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem conducted by them first build and peopled, conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Jewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Assur, saith Brocard. Neere unto this Citie the Prophet Jonas was three daies preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Casaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman waisted with fire and sword, because the Jewes which dwelt at Casaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere unto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them after which he himselfe is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phenicia.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephthaim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possesse the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phenicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-Libanus I have therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devourer all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest have perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of Heathen Princes, have bin torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very uncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Captis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Elenus, that falls into the Sea at the Iland of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterranean sea, as farre as the River of Chorfeus, which seemes to be that which the Jewes call the Torrent or River of Maggedo. Plinie extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budeus, Joppe and Gaza. Phenicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budeus) quae nunc Palestina Syria dicitur: it was called Phenicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phenicia, all the Sea side of Judaea, and Palestina, even unto Pelusion, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Calosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my selfe I take amiddle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own Art. It had in it these famous Maritimae Cities (besides all those of the Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Betrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Casaria Palestina: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing even unto Jesud's time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region: afterward called Phenicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandal Wars. But in proceesse of time the Citie of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first build and peopled,

G g 2

But

E. 17.

But after the death of Moses, and while Josua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sonnes Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possess the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second sonne) the use of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and findes Cadmus his successour, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdruball, Hannibal: whose memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

*Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroq; poposcit
Implevitq; mero pateram: quam Belus us'd omnes
A Belo soliti.*

The Queene anon commands the waightry bowl
(Waightr with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemes to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Lysia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors success'or living at once with Josua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his owne Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Josua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they received by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by theren plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites & Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistines which held the shores of Canaan, next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong Citie, Accho, afterward Ptolemais, Aschib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that David & Salomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the son of Japhet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word thouos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirme that Atilas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences and civill Policies, which they afterward profess, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinitie & Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, received Civilitie. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Africans; whence Lucan,

*Phœnices primi (sama si creditur) anfi
Manfuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. 3.

Phœnicians first (if same may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian; it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and not a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Phœnix; cui debet Græcia doctæ libris:

Athen. 1. Diogenes.

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zalmoxis flourish'd among them: when Atilas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all, for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourish'd most, both in Egypt, and Affrica, and he himselfe was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall flood: either by Setih or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcheions, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations, Jura naturalia communia & generalia, &c. Natural Lawes are common and justicem general.

Joseph contra Appianum.

§. II.
of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatsoever remaineth of the story and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachonatho, Mnaseus, and others of that Nation, being nowhere found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Josua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phœnis governed Phœnicia.

Chap. 27. §. 3.

In Hieremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependencie upon Darius, & that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Græcians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeares and somewhat more, betwene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subjects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Athen. lib. 2. c. 13.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dancers, and singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautifull and lively among them, he might recover them for his owne use and delights. Of this strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neere him with an Armie too waighy for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne body, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, He gave the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be conferred on some one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and presented unto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolonius, Iustine, Abdolonius, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs, and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding just.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subjected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, do in no sort agree in the times of their reignes, nor in other particulars.

Abibulus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus & Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibulus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibulus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eusepius) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83. Prep. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hierusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also he joyntly with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. & 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Grækes: and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, he despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astarte, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53. yeares. 2 Sam. 5. 8. c. 5. 2 Kin. 1. 9. 20. 1 Chron. 14. 2 Chron. 2. 8. 9.

Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Ba'orum, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeares, according to Iosephus. 2 King. 17. 37. c. 17.

Abdastartus the eldest son of Baleastartus, governed 9. yeares, and lived but 20. yeares, according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. yeares, and lived 54. who being slaine by the four sonnes of his owne Nurse, the eldest of them held the kingdome 12. yeares.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus recovered the Kingdome from this Usurper, and reigned 12. yeares.

Afarimus, or Arharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeares, and lived in all 54. Ioseph. 5. 4. Theoph. 5. 8.

Phelles the fourth son of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astartus, and reigned 8. months, and lived 50. yeares.

Tibobalus (or Iustobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astartus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddess Astarte, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeares; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Eitbaal, whose daughter Jezebel, Achab married. Ioseph. 3. 2. Theoph. 12.

Badezor or Ba'zor the son of Tibobalus or Eitbaal, brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeares, and lived in all 45. 1 King. 16. 31. Theoph. 12. c. 12.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. yeares (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Anna. Ioseph. 9. 2. Theoph. 12. 9.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. yeares, and lived 56. In the seventh yeare of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeares and 8. months after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. yeares after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion covetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleeve Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barcae in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Salomon. Iustine. 1. 1. Virgil. 1.

Etlens succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. yeares: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmanaſſar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his ſiege before it on the Land ſide five yeares, but in vaine.

After Etlens, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himſelfe to be as wiſe as Daniel: and that he knew all ſecrets (ſaith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was ſlaine in that long ſiege of Nabuchodonosor: who ſurrounded and attempted Tyre 13. yeares together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeares a tributary, perchanche, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, ſucceeding each other: Firſt, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelous, Abarns the Prielt, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them ſome 7. yeares, and odd months: after whom Balaturns commanded therein as a King for one yeare: after him Merbabus ſent from Babylon, 4. yeares: after him Iru ſent thence alſo, 20. yeares. In the 17. of whoſe raigne Cyrus began to governe Perſia.

§. III.

Of Bozius his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a diſcourſe of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath writtē a Traſt at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance who only is unchangeable, and the ſame for ever; yet whereas the ſaid Bozius, enforcing heere-hence, that the proſperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forſaking the true Religion; to prove this his aſſertion, ſuppoſeth the Tyrians to have bin Edumæans, deſcended from Eſau, Jacobs brother: firſt, it can hardly be beleevēd that Tyre, when it flouriſhed moſt in her ancient glory, was in any fort truly devout and religious. But to this end (beſides the prooffe which the Scriptures give of *Hiram*s good affection when by Salomon built the Temple) he brings many conjecturall arguments; whereof the ſtrongſt is their pedigree and deſcent: it being likely in his opinion, that the poſterity of Eſau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeavours to ſhew, partly by weakere reaſons, painefully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witneſſe, that the Tyrians came from the red Sea, in which there were three Iſlands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elab and Eſiongaber; or under the Amalekites, who deſcended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whoſe chiefe City was Madian, ſo called of Madian the ſon of Abraham by Cethura, whoſe poſterity did people it: the conſequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Iſrael. Hereunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worſhip of Aſtaris, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themſelves differed much in their Philoſophy from the Idolatrous cuſtomes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was a Univerſity, wherein as may appear by Eliphaſ the Temanite, who diſputed with Job, Religion was ſincerely taught.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozius, who labouring to proove one Paradoxe by another, deſerves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Eſau brought up his children, it is no where found writtē; but that himſelfe was a prophane man, and diſſuaded by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expreſſe. That his poſterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the ſecond booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the houſe of Iſrael, ſave only when David & ſome of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in ſubjection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant of *David*s unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when firſt they were ſubdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance betwene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David, even then when Job ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſedome of Eliphaſ the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the Citie of Teman whence Eliphaſ came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoining to Huſi, the country of Job: and to ſuch the Citie of Bildad the Subite; as both ſuch Chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy Text maketh maniſeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Salomon in wiſedome, all the people of the Eaſt; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Paleſtina. True it is that Eliphaſ the ſonne of Eſau had a ſon called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in thoſe dayes to take name of their ſonnes, I no where finde. And Iſmael alſo had a ſon called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Teman in the Eaſt had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the Eaſt are called Iſmaelites. And he that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a Nation Amalec was, which durſt give battaile to the Hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeveth ſuch a people were deſcended from one of *Eſau*s grand-children. For how powerfull and numberleſſe muſt the forces of all Edom have bin: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had bin ſo great? ſurely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec, or aſſiſted the Amalekites, when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it ſelfe, if diſtinct from the Iſmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Cethura, doubtleſſe was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniory of the Red-ſea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Eſiongaber on the Red Sea ſhore, yet in Moſes time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelfe ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſſe all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian flood, Moſes muſt needs have known it: becauſe he had ſojourned long in that Country; and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjecturall Arguments, how probable ſoever, are needleſſe in ſo maniſeſt a caſe. For in the 83. Plaſ, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authours ſhew, and Bozius himſelfe confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to have bin deſtroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Aſſer, Joſ. 29. becauſe they were Idolaters, and of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, not Couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame Religion. For though Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed bee God that hath ſent King David a wiſdome: we cannot inferre that he was of *David*s Religion. The Turke hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worſhipped Aſtaroth; and drew Salomon alſo to the ſame Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiving therefore of Salomon great proviſion of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-peſtered, being otherwiſe apt to yeeld ſilkes: as the Andarine ſilkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne & Oyle, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well ſpare to Salomon. Alſo Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiſer; who having got the gold firſt, gave to Hiram the worſt Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy which enforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For David had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorough which Countreies the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their ſleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrus: ſo that Salomon being Lord of all the Countreies through which they were to paſſe, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon, as Lord of the Sea-townes which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betweene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozrus frames negatively upon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was; I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that having more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine have purchased divine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excellently the Vulgar, even of civill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Lepis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomon time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozrus, who would have us thinke them to have bene formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styeth men of contrary opinion, Impios politici, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not knowne his name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozrus would better have agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neereest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save onely that of the Jewes, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterward enertaine in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jewes, they rejected, upbraiding the Jewes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd & foolish conclusion which Heathen writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozrus, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimeras of Divinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists & Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitie it is, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Having now past over Phoenicia, we come to the next Territorie adjoining: which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Joseph excepted) then entered the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men, 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, betweene Manasse, and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samar, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amri or Omri King thereof, and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, & as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebas, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This Citie is often remembered in the Scriptures: & magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brocard observeth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brocard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebas. Herein were the Prophets Helisans and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Neere Samar towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, & a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Jeroboam erected one of his golden Calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Napolsa: It was destroyed by Simcon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with the foyle. Jeroboam raised it up againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirathon, on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Judge of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Judas Macchabeus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jos. 10. and Saron, whose King was slaine by Josua: it is also mentioned Act. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Casarea Palestina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Joppe, faith Adrichome: though indeed the name Saron is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitfull plaine Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, betweene Casarea and Joppe, but that also betweene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Ezay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdias, read Saron for Asaron: understanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judas, the first in dignitie (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cut out Amor. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Joppe, Saron. This Joppe was was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Ravens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, usurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their owne glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most salvage and barbarous Nations.

Macc. 1. 7. 40.

In Diopolis (saith Wil. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to be built over his Tombe; these be Tyrinus his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatrie, & Joppe per laic patentem planitiem Elutheriam petrae transeuntis, Liddamque est Diopolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt. ejus Ecclesiam quum ad boorem ejusdem Martyrii, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They having left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatri, and Joppe, passing over the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present devotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrinus: by whose testimony, we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slain there in an uprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the uprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had bin gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honorable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrinus above cited, witnesseth to have bin buried at Lidda or Diopolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitruvius S. Hieron, affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Neere to Lidda or Diopolis standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Joseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda neere Thebes in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthalim, not farre from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adjoyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fift, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Josephus in his Antiquities, and in the warres of the Jews. Also Balsalifa (for which Junius, 2. Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Balsalifa) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1 Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofsa, one of the Togachies or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-Sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Togachies or Presidencies of Juda, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gau; which City and Territory, Israel gave unto their Leader Josua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in *S. Hieron*es time, and over it the Sunne engraven, in memory of that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Josua's time.

In the places adjoyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Judas Maccabeus with 3000 Jewes overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gaser or Gaur, which Josua took, and hung their King; a Citie of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jeset, of which Jos 16. 3. otherwise Pelet, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, under the charge of Bania. Then that high and famous Mountaine and City of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept for many years, till the Philistims got it.

To this they joyn the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Jonathan Maccabæus Secin Benjamin inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophesied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam; after the great overthrow given him. Then Kimbitaim, of the Levites, of which Jos 22. 2. which Junius thinks to be the same with Jokneham, of which 1 Chron. 6. 28. As for Abisalom Baalafor, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it in the Plaine of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Juda; as Jos 15. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedeth, v. 23. and the other the same as Chatzor, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, joyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelech King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute upon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Citadell: and so Junius for domus Millo, reads incole munitionis, and for Salomo edificabit Millo, he reads edificabit munitionem, and so the Septuagint reads edificabit in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built; cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuah, whose King was slain by Josua; and Janoach or Janoah, spoyled by Teglasphalassar; Pekah then governing Israel; with divers others; but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the land of the sons of Joseph, on the West of Jordan: several parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria; 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Jud. 2. 9. the Hill of Tilmon or Salmon, Jud. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tilph or Tisphim, Ju. 9. 5. where Rama-Tisphim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines upon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of Prophecy, Gen. 49. 22. compared Joseph two branches, Ephraim and Manasse; to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Wel side, and spreading her Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel, c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) professes: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lion. Upon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which over-looketh all the plains on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Castle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Joseph, 1. Bel. Jud. 2. 2. in which Cattle, as it is 1 Macc. 16. Ptolomie most trauersouly, at a banquet, slew Sinna Maccabæus his Father in Law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gas, remembered in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Junius reads Hiddus ex una vallium Gahsi: yet the Vulgar and Vatilius reads Giddus of the River of Gas. Also in this Tribe they place the River of Canith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought, where he was fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne hee revived, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Jeroboam to Achiab.

Of the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speake, and reserve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Jeroboam the sonne of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zoreda, who being a man of strength and courage, was by Salomon made overseer of the buildings of the Munkion in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from that Jacob in this prophetic the rather useth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to signify the Colonies: which in the Hebrew phrase are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Josua and else where often.

b 1 Reg. 17. 4. & ch. 17.

Hierusalem, he encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God destined to bee King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Ophores, whose Daughter hee married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captaine Joab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judea; that himselfe might the easilier spoile it, as hee did: for in the fift yeere of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Salomon, and all the spoiles which David tooke from Adadzer of Soba, with the presents of Tobin, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Jeroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though hee were permitted by God to governe the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their usuall Sacrifices, they might bee drawne from him by degrees) hee erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Ape, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Arons Calf in Horeb): further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chiefe seat and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Judean Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardened upon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Abijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

Hee was afterward overthrowne by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Asa King of Juda: hee feared himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Neptalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres, and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambrius, after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambrius succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven dayes; but Ambrius in revenge of the Kings murther, set upon Zambrius, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and enforced him to burne himselfe.

Ambrius or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambrius was also an Idolater no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benhadad according to Eusebius, Nicethorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela, who forewent Ambrius. This Ambrius raigned twelve yeeres, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Achab succeeded Omri, who not ouely up-held the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but hee married Jesabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian:

nian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the triall of the sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets; and afterward flyeth for feare of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michas) reproveh him: afterward hee caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Jezabel in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine, as Michas had foretold him.

He had three sons, named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas: besides severitie or other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: hee brui- sed himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsell to Beelzebub the god of Achaz. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were nora God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each fifty souldiers to bring Eliab unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercy at *Eliab*s hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to passe in the second yeere of his raigne.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Jezaphat King of Judea, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three Kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Desarts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrowne: their King flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a Sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, waisting and spoyling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, understand the Text to speake of the sonne of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner, by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatening, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom beought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other kings refused to yeeld unto, &c. that Moab, according to his former threatening, had burnt the King of *Edom*s sonne upon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the partie of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie: adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman, but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troope of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince in safetie.

The King of Aram notwithstanding these benefites, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noife of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Arael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezabel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Armie of Joram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprised and flew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Abab.

Pag. 86.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupie the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jehoram, for which he was plagued with grievous warre, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Jordan: in which warre he was slaine, faith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. years.

2 Kin. 13.

Joachaz or Jehoaahaz the sonne of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. years.

2 Kin. 14.

After Joachaz Josiah his sonne governed Israel, who when he repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Elisha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had 10 many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Josiah, who overthrew the son of Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities & Territory from Benhadad the son of Azael, which his Father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Amaziah King of Juda, who provoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it, with the Temple. This Josiah reigned fixtene yeeres, and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Josiah his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Jehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who reigned in his stead, governed fixe months. Shallum held the Kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Gadites.

2 Kin. 16. 19.

Menabem who tooke revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menabem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Israel. Menabem governed twenty yeeres.

2 Kin. 15. 29.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phaceia succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar, or Tiglat-Phylassar invaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan zion, Abel-Bethmaacah, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Gallilee, carrying their captives into Affyria: he was drawne in by Achaz King of Judea, against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achaz being waisted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, and therewith ingaged the Affyrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this invading of the great Affyrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Judea. Pekah reigned 20. years.

Then Hofhea or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Affyrian yoke, he sought ayd from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being knowne to the Affyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Affyria, and into Rages in Mesopotamia, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a river in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avims, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere unto Gath, whom the Captivims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Havveei, willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or Thuraa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adades of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affyrian advise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had waisted the Cities of Judea and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the yeare of the world 3292. the fifth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hofsea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Alcaron, Azorus, and other Townes,

NOW following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desert, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing arms. The first famous Citie in this tribe on the Sea-coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Josua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Jonas embarked himselfe when he fled from the service of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabeus governed the Jewes, the Syrians there were Garrison'd in Joppe, having their fleet in the Port, invited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their feet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

Matc. 23.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ, 1250. Lodowicke the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Jaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, wherunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Edileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem, 240 furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seate, faith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, there such a place there was.

After Jamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthonedon, faith Volatteran. And so Montanus seemes to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistin Cities, and in the place of Anthonedon. But Volatteran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthonedon farre to the South of Joppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Joppe: where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims, strong and Gyant-like men, whom Josua could not expell, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did divers others not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Roboam the sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azazel King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the Holy warre calls Ibailin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthonedon.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethemes, or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethemesites presuming to looke there in, there were slaine of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter & the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great Abel, faith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Isachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palestina. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended the selfe against the Danites and Idumaeans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the god of Homers Elies. To which Idoll it was that Abaiah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health, whose messengers Eliab meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Afidon was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Josua failed to destroy, though he once possessed their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous Judas Macchabeus slaine by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lievtenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathan, and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also hee overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Romane re-built it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in *S. Hierome*s time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Athiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuchs, are Tir or Sarza, and Eithaol, and between them Castra Danis neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words, Jud. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Juda.

Judah, as the other also were bordering Townes betweene Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebas the Lievtenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Macchabees overthrowne.

Then Modin the Native Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeares after their first setting up, as Brocard and Breidenbach witnesse.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariatiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeeres in the house of Aminadab: till such time as David carried it thence to Hierusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoida, who was slaine between the Temple & the Altar: also Urias, whom Joachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it upon presumption than warrant, I omit as that of Calpin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabeus: and Lechis, whose King was slaine by Josua, in which also Amalech was slaine: The same which Senacherib tooke, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Josua c. 19. from the Per. 41. where also is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lechem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Casarea Philippi, as before, & made the Metropolis of Ituraea, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountaines of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of Vines which have no seeds or stones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and favour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THE Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Deserts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumaea, of which the first Citie adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Agagis or petty Kings thereof were called Ascalonitis: of which Volatteran out of Xenoph. in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymeneus: and that Ascalus being employed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie, and called it after his owne name: The same hath Nicolas in his Historie, faith Volatteran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third booke remembreth a Lake neere Ascalon, wherein there hath bene a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palafino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palestine.

It was one of the chiefeft and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sojus, Cygnus, Dorothius the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instauravit, saith Adrichomius.

2 Sam. 1.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hennemeth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathas: nor is speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalona. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call חַזְרָא, the Syrians Azan, of Azonus (as they say) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Janneus King of the Jewes surprized it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which stood thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gave many wounds to the Jewes till it was forst by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left John his sonne and Successour to be Governor. In Brocard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River of Besor, standeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a Citie was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constantia after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Julian the Apostata soone after favouring the Gazans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to bee called Gaza maritima.

On the other side of Besor standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Janneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus. Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrowed the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giving the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocollura: and Josephus Rhinocorura: * Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, betwene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and upon the River of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wildernesse of Beer-sheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14. 14.

1 Sam. 30.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Isiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Jes. 13. ant. 19. 21.

Next Dabir sometime Cariash-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Universtie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Daema:

Daema: Jes. 15. 49. it is called Urbs Samna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbabi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othniel, encouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Josua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appears Jes. 11. 11. 39. This Citie Jes. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which Jes. 19. 7. which also Je. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simon, (for which Junius thinks Hajin is named for Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Josua these two are distinguished) also Tolad, so named 1 Chron. 4. 29. for which Jes. 19. 4. we have Elbolad. Chai-ar-Susa, so named, Jes. 19. 5. for which Jes. 15. we have Chai-ar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus.

In the same places of Josua, and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Deserts.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelec: neere unto which Hagar wandered with her sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Giblin. The other Cities of Simon which are named in the places of Josua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they helpe us nothing in storie, I omit them: In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed * Geder, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Jes. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederthama) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they seated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chieft: unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are Besor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichor, as is noted in Esai.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda the fourth son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 746000: all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sons there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes. Agreeable to the greatness of this number was the greatest Territorie given, called afterward Judaea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kind of Sovereigntie over them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Beer-sheba, Tiglag, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be measured by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chieft of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judaea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them some poyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keniz, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Ascensu Scorpionis, or Acrab is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to bee in that the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achille, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, in closing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers; and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place unaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the lake Asphaltitis, this Countie had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnaturall finnes.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites man from Sehon King of Hebron.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sonnes inhabited; of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 47000. bearing armes. But before we speake of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borders: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews; by Esau or Edom the Idumæans; by Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife, the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abraham's brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possesed by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as far as the River of Tigris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the plains betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Armon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sat down on the North-east side of Armon, and possesed the Tract from Rabbat, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the River of Jaboc and Danabais was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations; all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possesed by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlahomer, after repulged by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzumims of Zutæi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amyrabel, and the rest; and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Armon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestors beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countreys, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hebron over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivall upon that border, when Fahab governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the son of Fahab, but his name was Balac the son of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephthah the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countreys against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Jephthah) had 300. years time to recover them, Judg. 11. and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time should make claime to these Countreys: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Ismaelites possesed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amaleck & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Jephthah's time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Sovereignty: and againe, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then fought to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and betwene it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon out of all within the Mountains. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Num. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possesed, as in the 13. chapter of Jos. v. 25 it appears.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jeshon. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses, 36. and 37. in Jos. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Jeshon.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Desart adjoining: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Josua where this Kedmoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beser & villæjus, reads Boser in solitude Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neare the Dead Sea (for the Countrey betwene being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Lebath, of which Genesis 10. verse 19. The Greekes call it Calbue: neare which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soone after their rising, being joyned in one stream, doe make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macharus, in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenæ, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Ingas, the Kings of Peru. The other towne is Macharus, the next betwene Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing upon a Mountaine

t. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

* So Junius reads for the Hebrew Hardath every where, &c. so also the edition of 1671.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom or the dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltis, and the salt sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) [al-] to the Sea of the wilderness, or rather the Sea* of the plaines, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180 furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deale lesse: but those that have of late years seen this Sea, did account it (saith * Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, speciei maris, sapore corrupti, or, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neq; vento impellitur neq; pelces aut suis aquis vulgare patitur, incertum unde superjecta vis solido feruntur, periti imperitig; nandi perinde attoluntur, &c. T but it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious and tur, &c. T but it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious and pestilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raised by the wind, nor indueth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilfull of swimming, as well as the skilfull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yeare it catcheth Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businesse.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning: 3 of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulness; for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, have nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltis. Iosephus desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskilfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sinke.

t. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possesse.

Num. 31. 22.
33. 24. Jos. 13.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrey (within Arnon) Reuben possesse (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 1. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vahab, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaac, the son of Zippor: which Balaac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaam: cursings or incantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God, blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, & to doe him service, he advised Moab to send Madianitishe women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen: but in the end he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saying that we finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the issue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hac prius fuerit, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity chooseth rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eightene years: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him; knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, David himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pur, over Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread downe the Idumæans.

The next King after *David*s time, of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mesha: who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who revolting againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda and Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, hee fled to Kir-hareseth, as is else where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assailed by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jeshophaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Jeshophaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab. Many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedechias time, fourcene Kings of Judab coming betwene, who wasted three hundred and odd yeares.

S. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as faire to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh sonne of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desert, 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben the Cities of Heshbon, Elhale, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab hababero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the Cities in the River is distinguished from the city upon the banks of the River, as also in like manner Jos. (c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Harher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neere Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possessed by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith hee hath given Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in divers places is said to be within and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harher, which is said in the same places to bee on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numb. 31. 35. where Arnon is said to bee divided into divers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. 25. where Harher is said to bee seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seemes, cannot bee the tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annus Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neare unto Gerafa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriake Magedu, or after the Greek Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adjoining to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanniba. By the circumstances of which storie it appears, that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias, and the Countrey of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and findes it to be Phiale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanniba. For as it appears by the story, not farre hence towards the North was the Desert of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Hérode, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and nor long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrach of Ituraa and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: wherein was noted that Josephus makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matth. 23. Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoining called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Jos. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the image of a sheepe, as is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to have been the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Diu. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Jos. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphaim: but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphai, the word would not have been in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuity: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth, Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazim. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this Citie understand David in his 120. Psalm: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad instead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalm doe rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Seni a Celebreni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decent, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) have many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrey seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded upon him, inferre what his Countrey was, and build unto him a Citie by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he was the same Jobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esaú, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Baldurinus are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory with with Arthanasius, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius, Emischnus, Apollinaris, Eusebius, and other cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Evagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greek ὅθεν which the Septuagint use for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Job 1. 1. sometime Ausit, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palastine and Calestria, besides Chamaitha (or Hamath) under Palmyrene, in the Countrey called by Protony Trachonitis or Barhanac, the bounds of which Countrey are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus feared, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israhelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneous borderers of the Israhelites, because their bounds were not onely joyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremie, Lam. 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecie, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O fili Edom, O que habitas in terra Hus; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguishingly, but readeth, Filia Edom, O que habitas in terra Hus, Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and King of Edom, which if they understand by it Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumaea. For it is very probable, that Esaú when he first parted from Jacob, did not leave himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lyeth on the South border of Judaea, but inhabited Seir far to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines, otherwise called Galaad, and Herman, which by corruption the Sidians call Shiron, and the Amorites Shenir, for Seir, and from this habitation did Esaú encounter Jacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaú his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esaú inhabited Seir to the South of Judaea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselves to the South of Judaea, bordering the Desert Paran, and stretched their habitations over the Deserts as far as Hore where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the son of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the son of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to have been lost: and partly because in Job 32. 2. Eliphaz the fourth of Jobs friends, which seems to be of Jobs own Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Jer. 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job 32. Eliphaz the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to understand Aram the sonne of Sem, Junius himselfe maketh plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he saith that one of Jobs friends (which must needs be this Eliphaz) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly), and in as much as hee readeth Nachor the Familie of Aram, or Ram, but the Familie of Syria; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syr an.

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Eliphaz his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds: as also by the Septuagint addition, that this Eliphaz was of the Land of Hus, or Ausit, it is implied that they thought onely Eliphaz to have beene of Jobs own Countrey.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the journey from Jerusalem Eastward, findeth Sueba, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desert, descended of Saba the son of Abraham and Kenan: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sacaei. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom hadad should recover his present sicknesse: He waged warre with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesee, he and the King of Juda, Achaziah or Ochoziah, are slaine by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azrael continued warre against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Jehoi he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Jehosaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated; and which hee himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasuries of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did it first. And notwithstanding this composition betweene Joas and Azrael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, Azrael vexed Joashaz, the sonne of Jehu, and brought him to that extreme, as he left him but fifty Horse-men, ten Chariots, and tenthousand Foot-men of all his people.

After Haazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Haazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joashaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several bartels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Haazael had taken violently from Joashaz.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Haazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost. Only Nicholaus Damascus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the sonne of Joas, recovered Damascus it selfe to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better it is Junius, Uique recuperabat Damascus ex Chamatham Jehuda pro Israele; that is, And he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatham of Judea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Storie. For when as Jehoi the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the son of Haazael, and had recovered the Cities which Haazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his sonne Jeroboam the second, it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Raz'in, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rafes, after Zonaras Raafon the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacaz King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalassar against Raz'in, who rook him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

- 1 Adadazer the sonne of Rehob.
- 2 Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Raz'in.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Tabremmon.
- 5 Benhadad, who invaded Baalsha.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.

7 Haazael, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his advancement: the same who overthrew Joram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Haazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Haazael which rook Geth more more, after the first Haazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Joram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Joas began to raigne in the 7. yeare of Jehu King of Israel: and after he had reigned 23 yeares, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Haazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jerusalem. It is also some prooffe that Haazael that took Geth, was not the same with Haazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeares, being, as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdom, and Commander of Benhadad's men of warre. To this Haazael (be he the first or second) succeeded 8 Benhadad the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.

9 Rezin or Rezin the last, who joyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betweene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Geshur, we find that Tobin was King of Emath or Camath in David's time, to whom he sent 3. Sam. 9. 9. his sonne Joram with presents, after David's victorie against Adadazer. Also Senacherib Esay 37. speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. III.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves againe.

Of Geshur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmal, and his Father Ammibur: to Talmal, whose daughter David married, it was that Abisalom fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephen or Syria, Soba or Calistyr there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adadazer, and Adadazer himselfe; and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the kingdom of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the Region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betweene Israel and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease posselt himself of the Cities of Nephtalim, leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomee calleth Nabonasser, after the revok of Hofea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanasser overthrew; happened neere about a time; that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ofia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Senacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeares after the captivitee of Israel and Samarita: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeare of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affrica and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeare of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeares. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeares.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, & his successors the Seleucida reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENJAMIN,
and of Eherusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitpa, shel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

E the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land, of their issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Terminus on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe nearest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the returne out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Ezra. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Machabaeus.

Samarim or Tfemaraim, named of Tfemary, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Jofua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achad: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest son Segab: according to the curse of Jofua: in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 14. calleth Jofua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and re-built by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Jericho stood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Jof. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Jof. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Jofua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Deserts, and celebrated the Paschever.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jof. 5. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Aegypti, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: from thence was called Collis praputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geli-loch, as appeares by comparing the places, Jof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jof. 22. 13. and Geli-loch signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two * Hills Gara-zim and Bebal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitpa of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were feared about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgement to the Israelites: of which two, Gilgal, (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitpa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to returne to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jeharim, and at length to Hierusalem) herein Gilgal it was that Jofua pitched up the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe over it: by which as it is set downe Jof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitpa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgement, there also were often the greatest meetings for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Ju. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Machabaeus gathered the Jewes, (when Hierusalem was possessed by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added, Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitpa antea Israeli. Touching this Mitpa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitpa of Juda, of which Jos. 15. 38. Mitpa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad, Mitpa of the Moabites, 1 Sam. 12. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitpa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we have said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremy, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewrie, as Governour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: untill (to the great hurt of the Jewes) he was slain by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Juda, as it is Jerem. 41.

Neere unto this Mitpa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophye against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called Lu, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jos. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Lu, neere adjoining to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it Beth-aven, that is, the house of Vanitie, Hof. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them over.

The Territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Jeroboam, (of which 2 Chron. 23.) was taken from them, and adjoynd to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, as appeares by the storie of Jofua: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherema, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appeares 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Jos. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities, often mentioned

2. 1 Sam. 7. 15.
b. Junius in this place, for Bethel reads Doman Dei-fan, and interpreteth Reah-jeharim, wherethe Arke abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exod. 23. 17. the greatest meeting in their annuall feasts were to be where the Arke was, but this place doth not speake of feasts, but of judiciall meetings: and besides the priests did use to bring the Ayero there, wherefore they were, as appears 1 Sam. 22. 1. & 14. 18. neither is it castrum capud Bethel, otherwise than for the Citie Bethel.

c. It was no other than this Mitpa of Gilead, of which Jos. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Vespasian, for Jofua notes the three quarters, North, West, & East, to which he followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place imagine a Mitpa or Alapha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Affra. d. 1 Sam. 7. 15. Jos. 16. 1.

difficultie enough: and the Citie meanelly inhabited, and without wals or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeares, till Nehemiah by the favour of Ariaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagoles, or Pagoles, the Lievtenant of Ariaxerxes: after by * Ptolomeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes and again by Apollonius his Lievtenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

raigne of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that he left them farre more stately and glorious than they had bene in the days of Salomon.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenced by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntarie contribution of the people; and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captivitie, the people of the land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the second Temple, was required by the bountie of his son Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the riches, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the raigne of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that he left them farre more stately and glorious than they had bene in the days of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romans.

In this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeares. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jewes, from all parts, were come up to the celebration of the Passeover: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no maner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civill dissension, oppress them within the walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victorie, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had bene any such place or habitation. Only the three Herodian towers (works most magnificent, and over-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jewes as were scattered here and there in Judaea, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, & tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeares, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Elmus Adrianns the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another, of that ungrateful Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he took one part without the wal, wherein stood Mount Calvarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Alia Capitolina. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence-forth ever enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especialy by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeares. It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeares.

In the yeare 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Beillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained under the successors of Godfrey fourscore and eight yeares: till in the yeare 1197. it was regained by Saladin of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeare 1517. in the time of Sulim, the Turkes cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzambazet, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bin beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bin Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himselfe of the very places they possess; of the wals and buildings, yea, of the soyle and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitye and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Israel, it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heaven, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe: neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moveables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Jewes.

Of the originall of the Jewes, prophane writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirme that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Joseph, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damasus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not mixe out of their owne Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Joseph.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossely belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, having in the first booke of his owne History truly confessed the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: & thought it most prophane to reprecious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods judgements against himselfe.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Jofua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron and Hierufalem, which they burnt, and the ſchuyſes after re-edified. They tooke alſo the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathſepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not ſo ſet down in expreſſe words that any one perſon commanded in chiefe over the people, as Mofes and Jofua did: yet it ſeemeth that Caleb was of greateſt authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their warres. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good ſucceſſe which followed their undertakings, witneſſeth the contrary. And it was Caleb even while Jofua governed, as appears, Jof. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the reſt of the Cap- taines: for the performance of which enterpriſe, he promiſed his Daughter Achſah: which he performed to Othniel his younger brother after the conqueſt: whoſe behavi- our in that ſervice was ſuch, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the great- eſt reputation among them, and may be eſteemed the ſecond cauſe of his preferment and eſlection for their firſt Judge ſoone after. But while thoſe of Juda made warre with their borderers, from whom they once recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Valleys, becauſe they had Chariots of Iron). The reſt of the Tribes ſought alſo to enlarge and eſtabliſh their owne Terri- tories. In which warre they laboured with variable ſucceſſe: for as the houſe of Jofeph re- covered Beſhet, or Luſ, from the Hittites, ſo did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forc't them to ſave themſelves in the Mountains. And now the Iſraelites unmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculoſly a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies' (the Elders being alſo conſulted, who better adviſed them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely joyne them- ſelves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more deteſtable) they ſerved the Idols of Baal, and Aſheroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatrie, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Meſopotamia, whom Chu- ſhan Riſhathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the ſmart of Gods diſcipline againſt them eight yeares, it pleaſed him to have compaſſion on his people, and to raiſe up Othniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by God aſſiſted, delivered his brethren from oppreſſion, and enforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Diſarts, and into Meſopotamia adjoining: after which the Iſraelites had peace fourtie yeares, during all the time of Othniel's government. This Othniel is thought by To- ſtatus to have bin the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Judges he is twice called Othoneil, the ſonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret thoſe words [Calebs younger brother] as if they ſignified the mean- ing of this kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter ſhould marrie with her owne Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othniel ſhould have bin the meaneſt of the kindred. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as ſome learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture ſeeme to en- force. For Caleb was the ſonne of Jephanneth, and Othniel the ſonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers ſonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marry with his Couſin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Jofua to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to have bin no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Jofua and Othoniel that civill Warre brake out betweene the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eye. And as Judah led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to have bin when Jofua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governors, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil Warre, if their Power had bin as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

THere lived in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the first King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othoniel, and governed forty yeares. He was Father to Eriſthens: his Daughters were Pegon and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables. Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Diomysius, or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharſus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion & Zeſeus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ebudus time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Froes upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee the desires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the sonne of Eleeſius King of Eleeſina: which Eleeſius by careful industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea: in kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent upon her prow: because he made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieve his people with Corn, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conversant with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the marke of time, of all others the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but conjecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, which that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reignes of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salemons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the severie Weekes, and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many wayes to uncover the Sunne: that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better judgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad unquam querenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ebudus time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about those times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to performe which he joynd the forces of Ammon, and Amalec unto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feeble the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himselfe exposed to those perills, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eightene yeares under Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance: but raised up Ebud the son of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could not extinguiſh, he assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to reestablish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ebud went on as an Embassador to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access to the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his cloſet upon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repaſſe Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samgar his Successeur had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of fourescore yeares from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the dayes of Ebud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, travailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeares which are given to Ebud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hypponissus in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he meane not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrrius, with whom Hercules and Theſeus joynd themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrius, and tare him in peeces, and had also worried Theſeus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theſeus out of Hell. But Zeſes, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theſeus and Pyrrius, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theſeus and Pyrrius were both taken; and because Pyrrius was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theſeus drawne on by a kinde of affection or enforcement, the one was given for food to Pyrrius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus delivered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greeke questions.

The rape of Orithyia, the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might not come plaine, perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in lawes mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloth, and sent into Progne. In revenge whereof Progne caused her onely sonne Irys to be cut in peeces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, she caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets fained, that she was turned it to a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulia in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built neere the Rockes Megei, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulia, where these things are supposed to have bin done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farr from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleeve, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to have bin partly because, as Pausanias says, Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines: as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Neere this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Pratus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth yeare of Ehud, Tros began to raigine in Dardania, and gave it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, devised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia, and also of that part of which the people were anciently Meones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not enjoy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pletis: Dionysius and Didymus in Zeles, give him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his owne son to be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seeke after Divine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all esse the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captas
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seekes for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousnesse:

Tantalus a labiis sitiens fugientia captas
Flamina, quid ridet? mutato nomine de re
Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coetaneis corviciis Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his owne age, to make them live?

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinitie ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and revered myteries are often perverted by an uncleane and defiled minde.

To you it is given (saith Christ in Marke) to know the myserie of the Kingdome of God, but unto them that are without all things bee done in parables. So is it said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre upon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem tantum certum usque, ad illud progressio suppeditavit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; If Paul might have uttered the thing, the knowledge whereof the third heavens, and his going thither did bring unto him, peradventure wee might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, que ita recipere, ut sens tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabæus: quare silentium indicxit discipulis, ne vulgo divinarum arcanorum pateficerent, que meditando facilius quam loquendo apprehenduntur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne myteries which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a wall, or Scarabie, and uncleane flies (veraigne ornament). Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose divine myteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus lived whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latonæ. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoyd Juno's revyenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was delivered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the son of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the grave of this Gyant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Quærit

Por:

Perceit usque novem Tityus per jugera terra, Aspidus atro viscere pascit aves.

Nine furlongs stretch lyes Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Pocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet fill lived, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſalie lived also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Heard-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus, he crost the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ovid, which saith:

*Ilion aspiciet, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyra.*

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this worle. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, lived Perſus, the sonne of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus) seeke their adventure on Africa side Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as he hunted, neere the Lake Tritan, was surpris'd and slaine: whose beauty, when Perſus beheld, he caus'd her head to be embalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athen, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eufebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Judge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who incited by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Præus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accus'd him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Præus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betwene him and his sonne in law Jobates: giving secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employ'd him against Chimera, a Monster vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perſus in Africa, to transport him: a horse that none other could master or biddle but Minerva: upon which beast Bellerophon over-came Chimera: and performed the other services given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slaine him: but being victorious also over all those, he arrived to Jobates in safetie: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flye up to heaven upon his Pegasus: whose pride Jupiter disdainng, caus'd one of his stinging flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heaven: and being fed in Jupiter's owne stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diversly expounded; as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieve men in their innocency and undeserv'd adversitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazzard, or rather certaine death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing proud proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremity of sorrow, and ever-during miserie. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimera was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of sayles (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquities of their parent Javan) derive their name of Iones, is said to have bin about Ehud's time: Homer calls them Jones, which hath a neerer resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Javan: it being a custome observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betwene the coming out of Adam into Egypt, and the death of Jofua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IIIL.

of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giver of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar; the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie, so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which all estates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their fines were againe ripe for punishment, Jabin King of Haſor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territorie of Israel; and having in his service 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty yeares, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Barac to levie a force out of Nephthalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to have proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Haſor and Harosheth the chiefe holds of Jabin, were in Nephthalim. So in the dayes of Jephtha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the Warre was, pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and restlesslest, he overthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Jofua: sometimes by the ministrie of men, as when he overthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorloamer, and his companions, by the household servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their owne confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slaine them, to kill one another in the sight of Jehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sifera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Jabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfulnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate wherunto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or speare seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and the children kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. Shee then cursed the Inhabitants of Meroz, who durst not joyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sifera, in her Tent: the shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sifera who promised her son the victory in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoils, both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise & thankes to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdome of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdome Lives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus divided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos: it selfe: Prætus his brother possesse Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthus, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthus, which witness Prætus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was fore-told by an Oracle, that he should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is said that Jupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this Perseus, to avoid the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault, under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custodie Horace hath this witty observation:

*Inclusam Danaen turris aenea, Robustæq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubiæ munierant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:*

*Si non Acrisium Virginis abditæ
Custodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Resissent, fore enim tuum iter & patens Convisio in pretium Deo.*

*Aurem per medios ire satellites,
Et perumpere amas saxa, potentius
Isti fulmineo,*

The brazen Tower with doores close barr'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead,
Of Danae from secret love:

Till smiling Venus, and wife Jove,
Beguil'd her Fathers dread

For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did poure

Himselfe, and tooke his pleasure,
Through guardes, and stonie walls to breake,

The thunder-bolt is farre more weak,
Than is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argives were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first year of Jacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. years. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544. years, others but at 417. 10 was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, & the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penthius. In Tisamenus time the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Atidas, who reigned in Phrygia: and Ius, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this age.

Debora and Barac being dead, the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when, under a Judge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattell, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thicke as grasse-hoppers; which servitude lasted seven yeares.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred up Gideon the sonne of Jash, afterward called Jerubbaal: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noyse, and seeing at the cracke of so many pitchers broken (so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with travaile, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, hee destroyed with travaile, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, hee destroyed with reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna; which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like reliefe from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the revenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes & Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zebah and Zalmunna were elaped with a great part of their army, might feare their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both envie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be desired to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wheresoever it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request, slew them with his owne hands, his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refreshing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene said before. The debts of crueltie and mercie are never left unsatisfied: for as hee slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unskillfull torments, so were his owne 70. sons, all but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec: The like Analogie is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliverance, as they offered him the Sovereignie over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not raigne over you, neither shall my childr raigne over you, but the Lord shall etc. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings which every man had gotten. For the Isnadites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew filke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set up the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Arke; and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, wee may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Armie came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went down to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Ageus, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Eurythius King of Mycene: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurythius, the Kingdome of Mycene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jealousy, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this crueltie was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the linage of Atreus dyed by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to have beene done, which are written of Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they say, having slaine his Nephew Atalrus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship hee was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that shee, being in love with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no lesse unnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater, of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appears by those verses of Marcellus, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pasiphae, in those vicious times.

*Iunxam Pasiphaen Dilecto credite Taurō
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar, long eva venisset
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a lesse unhoped construction of it, thinking that Dedalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child; and that the being delivered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was delivered of the Monster Minotaur, half a Man, and halfe a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dedalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dedalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chafe. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himselfe overbold, was overborne and drowned.

A place in Babylon, as it is thought.

It is also written of Dedalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, armes, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the bodie and head of those men, whom they carried to counterfeite, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dedalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linnus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpichore, who instructed Tamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthian Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and unaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissolving her probleme, his victorie over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon, for her cruelty. But that which Alaphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitfull part, with her own troope she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre upon the Theban, till by Oedipus overthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slaine by them. He possit himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, Daughter of Misus the King. He was long master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribune of delivering him every year seven of their sons: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dedalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giver to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Cyclops, who was said to have 60. and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lie. That Anteus was of great strength and a cunning wrestler, Euclides affirmeth: and because hee cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirmes, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

About the eleventh yeare of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this.

Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Esion, who was Jason the other, reigning in Iolcos a town of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed: to which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchus to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Zyndarus, Telamon and Peleus sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiaras the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde Boare: Ascalaphus and Jalmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Læertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lyneus the sonnes of Caphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyneus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arrived first at Lenno; the women of which Iland, having slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blows, in somuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe, and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Æetes, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Mysia called Cius, wherein he reigned: Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonauts sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. Hee being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him at whole bats, in which kind of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sayled from hence to Salmydessus a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds which had the faces of women, and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice, and direction for their voyage; you shall doe wel (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat set on which was no sooner set down than that presently in came the Harpyes and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this; they drew their swords and pursued them through the air; some say that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearineffe in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did covenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, & advertised them withall of the dangerous rocks called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut up the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, & perceiving that the Pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they observed the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, only the end of their poepe was bruised.

which time we must count her no lesse than fiftene yeares old; for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now. She was then at least two and fifty yeares old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stollen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnassus, doe in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeare of Demophon King of Athens, the successeur of Menestheus, the successeur of Theseus, seventeen dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellepont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeare, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polypus, who governed Sicyon, Menestheus, Athens, Taurians, Assyria, Habdon, Israel, then Eneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia, Phaestus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adrastus, who reigned foure years, & Polypides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Menestheus King of Athens, and Atrius, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Judges, Misreus, and after him Taurians, reigned. In Egypt, Amesiphis, the son of Rameses, and afterwards Anemenes.

§. V. II.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection.

*Si nulla fuit generis alio origo
Rerum; & mundi semperque aeterna fuisset,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojae,
Non alius alii quoque res occidere Poeta?*

If all this world had no originall,
But things have ever bin as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very salvage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his owne longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercoure they used little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more come than was necessary for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves, and the copper armour of Dionides worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the usuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might have enjoyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these later times times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that favoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, having bin cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what evill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage, contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Jocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, hee begate two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in processe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee understood the grievous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife (and mother) did hang herselfe. Some say that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should raigne one yeare, and the other another yeare, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a yeares government resigned the Kingdome to his Brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeare, hee refused to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde unto Argos, where Adrastus the Sonne of Talaus then reigned, unto whose palace coming by night, he was driven to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backe-side.

There hee met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striving about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noise, came forth and tooke up the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, hee remembered an olde Oracle by which hee was adviled to give his two daughters in marriage to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deippe upon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countreies. To this purpose levying an Army, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was desirous among others to carry Amphiaras the sonne of Oicleus a great Sooth-fayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaras, who is said to have foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, save onely Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaras, offering unto her a very faire bracelet, upon condition that shee should cause her Husband to assise him. The Sooth-fayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbade his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a Jewell, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversie betwene Amphiaras and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did love a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than avoide destiny, sought for such comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre upon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seven chiefe Leaders were himselfe, Amphiaras, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecistheus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Boetian, and Parthenopius the Arcadian, sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a woman, whom they desired to helpe them to some water; shee having a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argives to a spring: but ere shee returned, a serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hippisyle the daughter of Theas the Lemnian, whom shee would have saved when the women of the Ile slew all the the males by conspiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her Piety the Lemnian wives did sell her to Pyrras, and the Pyrras to Lycurgus Lord of the Country, about Nemæa, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When upon the childes death she hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemæan, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with the whorl bats, Amphiarus at running and quiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopæus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltes a Lacedæmonian. Some say by Hercules when he had slaine the Nemæan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set downe.

From Nemæa the Argives marching onwards arrived at Cithæron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much envie and malice of the people, who layd fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the Army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster up more thousand than Thebes had gates) did compass the Towne, Adrastus quartered before the gate Homolides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Cronus, Amphiarus at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchæis, Parthenopæus at Eleusa, and Polynices at Hypsæa. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advise of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans if Menæcius the sonne of Creon, a principall man of the City, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Divell, and so envious at his Creators glory, that he not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gals, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, &c. of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wile, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphius in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Afrika, and crucified the Priests in the groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living: yet among the Salvages in the West Indies these cruell offerings have been practised of late ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely covered and hidden by this subtiltie among civill peoples: so may it serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarities then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soone as he understood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as hee thought) upon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the City. Then was a battell fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the wals, got up upon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast down, (or as Writers have it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Asiæ behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismaus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of the seven Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the seven (who was said to have bin so faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphidius, or, as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the braines. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should have made him immortall, refused to bestow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fled: of whom Amphiarus is said to have beene swallowed quicke into the earth, neare to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcasses, or drowned in the river: and his bodie never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercie, he made supplication for their aide to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to bee buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then living of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because she had sought out and buried the bodie of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie under the conduct of Thebes, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to Sepulture: at which time Evanæ the wife of Capaneus threw her selfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captains which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse revenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne year after having levied forces, Agialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Stenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Eurypylus of Menippus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcæmon, the son of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcæmon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battell, and slew Agialeus, yet was hee put to the worst, and driven to flee, (or according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcæmon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conveyed themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and downe, till at length they built the Town called Ephæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the wals, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thersander, the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigine over them. That he saved the Citie from utter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Joseph, and how the three hundred yeares which he speaketh of, Jud. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 11. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Jair (neere about whose time these things hapned in Greece, & during whose government, & that of Thola, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the law and service of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adjoining, and imbraced the idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, & Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Nidians: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites and afterward by the Philistines. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion than of divellish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the Warre, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victorie. And when hee had disparted with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beate them out of the plaines, but forc'd them over the mountaines of Arabia, even to Mimith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victorie it is said, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature hee encountered, comming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and only desired two monthes time to bewaile her Virginity on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Barhaus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephtha heretupon inforced to defend himselfe against their furie, in the encounter slew of them 42000. which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephtha, after he had judged Israel fixe yeares, died: to whom succeeded Elon, who ruled seven yeares: after him Eliab was their Judge tenne yeares: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessarie upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times Jud. 11. 28. (where he saies that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeares) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of Saint Paul, Act. 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeares: Saint Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Hei. 450. yeares. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeares. To the first Beroaldus findeth Jephtha's 300. yeares to be but 266. yeares, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Osiboniel, 80. of Adad and Sangar, 40. of Debon, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certaine number for an uncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum ogi popti trecentefimum, ex quo nullus licet eade re moverit Israeli: So he speaketh (saith he) annum, meaning that then it was about or well-nigh the three hundredth yeare, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeares than Jephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. where of 71. were spent in Israel's captivity, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonite should have justly objected, that 71. of those yeares the Israelites were in captivity and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeares, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365. yeares, besides the 71. yeares of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeares more, and so maketh up the summe of 365. These 28. yeares hee findeth out thus: twenty yeares hee gives to the Seniors betweene Josua and Osiboniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eightene yeares to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josuephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanthon 30. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeares is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeares of affliction (to wit, 34. yeares of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeares of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300. yeares. Neither is it strange that Jephtha should leave out more than halfe of the yeares of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71. yeares, and say, that during these yeares, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeares remembred by Jephtha, to bee 306. which odd yeares, saith hee, Jephtha omitteeth. But because the yeares of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but doe only compound 266. therefore doth Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia, 40. Petræ; which forty yeares of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Jephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jabboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly, or in peace. So by this place it is plaine, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephtha's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Arer, and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeares: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeares: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to posselt it, it seemeth somewhat strained to mee: for we doe not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeares hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtha's narration: when he makes a brife repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeares (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeares: and not onely the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephtha's owne words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeares, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Paul's and Jephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephtha's three hundred yeares of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Og had dispossest Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephtha might say that they had posselt those Countries 300. yeares, reckoning 266. yeares of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeares. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funicus Krentzheimus, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeare of Hei. but 357. yeares: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. yeares.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeares from the death of Josua, to the last of Hei. and leaves but thirty yeares for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crown three whole yeares ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. yeares, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefites to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in the Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it befit stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did then raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly this much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have beene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known & beleev'd of the Jewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large, of the 40. yeares consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeares. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the daies of Samuel the Prophet in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. yeares. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven yeares of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeares of the Judges: for this had bin an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeares is soe precisely and purposely set downe.

precisely and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his alcribing in the same place 40. yeares to the reigne of Saul : whereas it is manifest that those yeares were divided between Saul & Samuel, yea that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good manner, to help where the need is not overgreat : I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having no reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeares of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeares ascribed to the Judges ; which account the Apollle would not in this place stand for contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith quasi quadringenti et quinquaginta annis. As it were four hundred and fifty yeares. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it be so indeed, and therefore dis-join the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded, (as well they might and ought) that Poorus and precisely doth cast up the yeares from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Month it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new explication for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne conjecture upon a place that is full of controversie. Thus by expounding, after a strange Methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loatheth himselfe in those waies wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othniel could not governe above 25. years, because then was the taking of Laiſh, at which time there was no King in Israel: That the

*Dan*iels muſt needs have taken *Lul*ah at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Iſrae'l out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of ſervitude; And that the yeeres of Iſrae'l out of Egypt muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelf ſhould have ſpent this time vainly, in ſeeking to pleaſure S. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to uphold a Paradoxe, I leave it to the deciſion of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephtha are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Iliad: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailao or Elon, yet the Greeks had five yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, longæ præparatio bellis celerem affert victoriam; that a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greeks consumed ten yeares in the attempt: and Troy, as it seemes, was entered, sacked, and burnt in the third yeare of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the fixt yeere of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth yeare of his rule, died, after he had bene the Father of 40. sones, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Jud. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth yeere of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had little cause of quarrell against Jephthah, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own territories: and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Army for their owne deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? but Ammon being overthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogy of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

He Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to breake the story into pieces by rehearsing a part in divers years, the diversity of occurrences,

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertaine, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teneer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Pirrigi: which if he (as Renacci thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annus borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authority of Pirrigi, who saith thus:

*Creta Jovis magni medijacet insula Ponto !
Mons Idaus ubi, & gentis canabula nostra.*

Mentid. 23

Centum

*Centum urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
 Maximus unde Pater (sive audita recorde)
 Teuctus Rhæteus primum est aduētus adoras:
 Optavitq; locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arcem
 Pergamæ steterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
 Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiq; ara, Idæumq; nemus.*

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lye:
 Whence Jove was borne, thence is our progeny.
 There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
 An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
 Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Tencer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilium was built, and ere
 The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they fought In lo west Vales. Hence Cybelis rites were brought:
 Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove:
 And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Tencer first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
 Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; ubere gleba,
 Oenotrii coluere viri: nunc jam me minores
 Italian dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
 He nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
 Jassusq; Pater, genus a quo principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
 An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
Oenotrians held it: now the later progenie
 Gives it their Captaines name, and calls it Italy:
 This seat belongs to us, hence Dardanus,
 Hence came the author of our stocke, Jassus.

Alc Atmidia.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita fere senes, hic ortus us ægri
 Dardanus Idæus Phrygia penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
 Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
 Aurea nunc solis Hællæniæ regia celi Accipit, &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well,
 (Though time have made the same obscure) would tell
 Of Dardanus, how borne in Italy:
 From hence he came Phrygia did flee.
 And leaving Tuscany (where he earst had place)
 With Corytus did sail to Samothrace:
 But now enthronized he sits on high,
 In golden Palace of the starry skie.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Tenari, and Thracæ, are derived from Tarus or Thra, the son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Myrians, & Ascanians, mixt with the Trojan.

were German Nations, descended from Asbkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and river of Ascanus in Asia tooke name. That Asbkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardanii, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Tencer came of Tyrus, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tencer, whereas Hal carnassius makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Tencer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Aslus reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Aslus, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom he bare Jassus. Annus out of his Berosus findes the name of Camboblasion, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jassus; and further telling us very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the historie gives leave to Annus of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such libertie, wil forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it must have bene of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Aslus the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Tencer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others give him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Dei lib. 4. c. 3.
 Boccaccio de gen.

Many by valour have deserv'd renowne
 Ere Agamemnon; yet lye all opprest
 Under long night, unwept for, and unknowne:
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these writers have with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawne into suspition that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted with otherwise; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the Warre.

HERODOTUS fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians, had ravished Iō, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Iō. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened, to doe the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous: For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the injury of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Iō, plead any quarrell against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homer's time, which was long after the warre of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to thinke, that they should have fought revenge upon all Nations; as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus's sister, taken formerly by Heracles, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seemes) was an excellent man, seeing his owne sonne Tecuer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Tecuer could not remedy) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom shee had lived about thirty yeeres, and to whom shee had borne children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione, but was meereley incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discouereth; but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keep them to their owne use. So did Theseus and Pirithous attempt Proserpine; and so did Tebelus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appeares in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere unto the Sea, for feare of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus, the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in mony, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

This did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprize; take armes against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; onely they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except the Captaines) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homer's Iliads; but their followers and aides were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helen's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHEREFORE the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus's house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this. Paris in his return with Helen, being driven by foule weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that he made for pleasure: and if he were driven thither by contrary Windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to have bin driven thither by foule Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such Windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, untill such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had bene utter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Heclor was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had bene ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have bene twinnes) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Trojan warre. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Ambassadors returned all contented, and not very intreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchus (whom some say to have been a Runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines, and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needfull here to bee disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Divell, which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is made. Calchus also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some small impediments were removed: and that till ten yeares were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his Brother Nelauus: Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phenix; Ajax and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meneones; Nestor and his sonnes Antiochus and Thrasymedes; Ulysses, Meneleus the sonne of Petrus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Jalmenus, the sonnes of Nestor, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the sonne of Peon, who had the rowes of Hercules, without which Calchus said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aster the son of Oilus, Penelopeus, Thias, Emelus, Tyandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sithonius, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalirius, and Machon, the sonnes of Esculapius; Epeneus, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the towne was taken; and Proiclaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Grecians at the siege.

THese, and many other of lesse note, arriving at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeares worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Proteus, whom Heclor slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of men, they were ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherronesse: others to rob upon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeares, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were yet could the towne receive little losse by them, having equall numbers to maintain the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first yeare, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, & Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodotus, that the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeares: but onely did beare up and downe the sea exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies countrey, did blocke up the towne, unto which they returned nor, until the fatall time drew neere when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeare, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have bene supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeares together. Betweene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greekes remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted; and the people carried into Captivie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any rancome: but Heraclide interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the campe was over-pestered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie; whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchus had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had bene given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles desired him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as notable to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greekes, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appears by his words in Homer), or for love of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greekes when they wasted the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Heclor issued out of the towne, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Trojan armie, were Heclor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sonnes of Priamus: Eneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Astus, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrivall; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betweene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Heclor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remained unwounded, made head against Heclor, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troops, relieving the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, repelled repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his bodie, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the manner of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, having slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his bodie, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of make. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Captaines; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which drave up and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then lighting, fought on foot, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new hart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their armes defensive were helms, breast-plates, boots of brasse, or other mettall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keep them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heaviest: also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his own complete, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repaire it with the like, or had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom he had slain, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the bodie of Panclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe unto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behave himselfe, that he did not onely put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleved) he chased three times about the walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leape over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that fight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would have borne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what meanes soever) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his crueltie and covetousnesse were not long unrevenge; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in love, having slaine so many of her brethren; and his bodie was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-same rate that Hector was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe given of her valour, was slaine by Epyrrus the son of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthie persons on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the treason of Antenor and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertaine. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entering by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificial horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called an horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times used to do with the Rammeter scaled the wals upon the sudden; and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a wooden horse, it had bin a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to have thought upon: for they might have left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals upon the sudden to doe it:) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger; if they had not by lifting forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townesmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that warre made against the common report: had it not bene that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other Authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to have bene above 600000. on the Trojan side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to bee somewhat lesse than 120000. saile, and the armie therein transported over the Greece seas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deedes of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Miniscus the son of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bin a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italie; and from them the Romanes, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adjoining by Antenor: the Chonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersion of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to have beene the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into many pieces under severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous that they should have set saile, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Herupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole fleet was vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrrhus, whom Oristes afterwards slew also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Phylia in Italic. Agamemnon likewise returned home; but was forthwith slain by his wife, and by the Adulterer Egyptus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandering long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helan, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Ulysses after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much ado recovering the mastery of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Darius; Ajax who was Lord of the Japyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africa, others into Italic, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of many Towns which the Greekes were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bin at the war of Troy, were wont to call it. The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the unluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which Citie, as hath bin said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Samson, after a variance or Inter-regnum for certaine yeares, succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

HE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie, First, that the Angel of God forbad the wife of Mannah the mother of Samson, to drinke Wine or strong drink, or to eat any unclean meat after she was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength; and as it were wither and shrink the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himselfe, and delivered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Mannah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that professe divination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull reares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods; by the second his life. Quem nulla vis super eapornit, voluptas evertit: Whom no force could over-master, Voluptuosity overthrew.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to besiege Samson, in the rock or mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are rulers over us?

Or. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow, and slew 1000. with the jawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be avenged of his enemies, when hee pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sepe lesa vertitur in furor; Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken; and of Dagors fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

THE Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, & prophaning the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to call the Israelites under the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sons of Eli being slain, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stock of Ishamar the son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ishamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Abiue the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Bocci the fifth, Ozi the son of Bocci the sixth, and then Eli as Josaphus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ishamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successours. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where hee dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldaean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matissa or Mitisa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as he was sacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismayed, answered, Ego autem sacrifico. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of Warre at Matissa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia;) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophesie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall he thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victorie. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem fortis: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Idumites on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath bene elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI. OF SAUL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

BUT whenage now began to over-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to undergoe the burthen of so careful a government, hee put off from himselfe the weight of the affaires on his sonnes, Iud and Abijah, who judged the people at Beerseba, a Citie, the very utmost towards the South of Judea. And as the place was inconvenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgement to the best Chapman. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to part the government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choyce of a King,

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehorth them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is so still by free consent of the subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know, that the King will use their sonnes in his owne service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your best Olivetrees, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination confute this Text farre otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Sovereigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings; as many wives, covetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne over Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the dayes of his life; that he may learn to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of anothers vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne over you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, severed from pietie (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with Righteous judgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata equitas, non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio: Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie & dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to inferre. Only thus much I will say, That if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tyed by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what civill warre Iſrael had: where outrageous flauhters they committed upon each other: in what miſerable ſervitude they lived for many years: and when it ſared beſt with them, they did defend their owne Territories, or recover ſome parts thereof formerly loſt. The Canaanites dwelt in the beſt vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan, the Philiftins the Sea-coaſts; and the Iebuſites Hieruſalem it ſelfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and eſtabliſh, but hee maſtered and ſubjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vaffals. But whether it were for that the Iſraelites were moved by thoſe reaſons, which allure the moſt of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they fought to be cleared from the finnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perſwaſions and threats which Samuel uſed, inſiſting upon this point, that they would have a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to conſent, he ſent every man to his owne Citie and abiding.

1 Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the King, whom hee expected and stayed his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdome, and of Gods

At Mizpeh Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveale it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of * Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mystic upon his breast when he asked counsell of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plantus, Paulinus, and others, have remembered divers sorts of lots, used by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisorie; the third, Divinatorie; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds, howsoever they may seem chancefull, are yet ordered & directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Josephus confutes it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen king of Israel, wherupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glorie, as in all estates there are such, who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, tooke no notice.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victory.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nabab King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephtha, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossest them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephtha's time; yet they never perfwaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistims had not long before slain 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had used great care and policie that they should have no Smithes to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Benjamenites, and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to enlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neereſt. Besides, it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamenites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamenites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first yeares reigne, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamenites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus: That whoſoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, ſo ſhould his Oxen be ſerved threatening the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respice of these seven dayes to give Nabab the Ammonite answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezer, neere Jordan, that hee might readily passe the river; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

1 Sam. 11. 8.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirtie thousand, he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nabab the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword untill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troope enforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Jabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe, the people were so farre in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and as base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne down.

1 Sam. 12.

1 Sam. 13.

After the Armie removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now at third time acknowledged, and, as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the Assemblies, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his owne Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himself with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeab, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest he kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Beihel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall rejection.

Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by; when he came from Rama, when he was first anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to have beene Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison. 1. Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have beene at Gebah in Benjamin neere Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: & now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, & fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and encamped at Maichmas or Michmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this suddain invasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountains; others fledde over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not farre from the passage of Josua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven dayes: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall Lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obstulit, in this place, by obstulit per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to have beene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. secondly a difference or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, hee was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant beene given to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe: at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should bee conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

1 Sam. 13. 5.

1 Sam. c. 13.

Verse 14.

1 Sam. 13. 19.

1 Sam. 13. 21.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeab, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should bee able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirtie thousand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul & Jonathan his sonne. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, & all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as served for the Plough, & for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes, it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found among those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, & of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troope he held himself to his owne citie of Gibeab, as a place of more strength, & better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had beene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from Heaven: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvell if they could not in a short peace under Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philistims to bee understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him is to bee thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judea: Dionysius in Sicilie; & many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used and their present necessity ministred unto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Benjamites excelled in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were armed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that David himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their army into three troopes, that they might spoile & destroy many parts at once; Jonathan, strengthened by God, and followed with his Equire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adjoining. And though hee were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision, called up by his enemies: yet he so behaved himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and jealousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) most happie and glorious victory over them. Heere was that prophesie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and twise them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made reitrait from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food til the evening, yet his sonne Jonathan, being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to have reduced unto the Philistims remembrance their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel: so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertooke, by turnes all his bordering enemies, namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, & the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he prevailed. Herthen assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 20000. men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoile of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how severely it pleased God to injoyne the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to bee revenged on him, and his Nation above 400. yeeres afterwarde and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe having also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse. 1 Sam. 15. 23. among other women, at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had been by many bootlesse intricacies perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrences betwene the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom hee sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupefied in the opinion of fate or destiny, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the minde of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaigne here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Israh, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliah, the first born: who though he was a man of a comely person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other fixe brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocke; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of David: in which bloody minde he continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still & forborn to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new tryall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repaid with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiour to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to attempt happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Armie, possessed with needlesse feare, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mulstered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neare to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battell, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joining in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betwene their Camps. Just causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bin founded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heaven were to be feared. Goliath of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertooke to defie the whole Hoste of Israel, provoking them with despitefull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as overcome in grosse, and become vassall unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, until David (sent by his father on an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Gygant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yeelded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their owne gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the Spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fedde David in his necessities with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest, taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and heepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was antientarie to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel; had not now any mercie in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of Israel. Yea, hee would have slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for plying and pleading *David*s innocencie; as also once before for tasting the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former hee shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him to whom hee had given her; also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Divil this successe followed, that he should himselfe, and his three sons, with his nearest & faithfull servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walles of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Jabes stole their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40. yeares, & by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeares, according to Cedemur; Thophias and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, that Saul and Abigail after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained ; for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations ; cruelt the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly waisted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues; upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David borne : after Cr- doman, later, and in the ninth year : after Buzing in the tenth. For David, faith- hee, was thirtie yeares old when hee began to reigne : whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeares, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus became his reigne over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirtie years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and four King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Deucalis sat in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponessus, and at once with the Heralidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, possess a great part thereof 328 years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen the Sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrey of Phthia in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrey under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned over it. And becauser this is the farthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amiss to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Jupiter (as the Poets fable) was the son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

20 Japetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus; Pyrha; Deucalion: & his wife Pyrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrha (as Cretensis Bianus affirmeth) for Pyr-ha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Eolus: of Dorus and Eolus, the Dores and Eolians had name. The Eoles inhabited Boeotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward fear themselves about Par-nassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his owne use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the 30 Daughter of King Erichonius, he begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby fuch love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. Whenthe people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Syconia, then called Ægialos or Ægialia: In which Countie Selinus then reigning, thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wives name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave ro that Land denomination. But in after times the Dones affisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driven to seek a new leat, came unto the Tones, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and allgedd in vainethat Ion and Acheus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the son of Orestes in that warre.

Thus were the Jones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Asia, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at least without any universal or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Jones into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the warre of Troy, and 60. years after the descent of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdom about 700. years. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very swift Hare: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxen-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: the ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Heperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over-long to bee here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his travailes to bee the twelve signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihoode, than the fables: that hee tooke Elis, Pylus, Oebolia, and other Townes, being assited by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him. Also that hee slew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His travailes through most part of the world, are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libyus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indevours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death, no citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the verue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was Sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; hee reigned in Myseia, the mightiest City then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madness he had committed upon his own children; but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for employing the strength of Hercules to his good purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best Writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great jealousy by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein hee was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above threecore Children. These Children Eurystheus would faine have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Cepheus King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountered Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assited him in many of his travels, was captaine of the Heracleida. It is said of him, that being dead hee obtained leave of Pluto to live againe till hee might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there along time forgotten: he came againe into Greece to assit his cousins, and a fewerwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Atrius the Sonne of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Against him the Heracleida marched under Hyllus, the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echemus King of the Tegeata, a people of Arcadia, who assited Atrius; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracleida should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heracleida compelled to forebare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority doth shew, though some have said that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dorrs, whom whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achei, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus foure generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anaemon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to have beene long after these times, rashly framing his Era according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment of temporibus; and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, spring the diversitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homer: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. * Clemens Alexandrinus reports many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Anulus Gellius and Tatianus Affyrinus in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. years before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 350. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much ancients. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may ghesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diversitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heracleida returned into Peloponnesus: and * Eratostenes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 100. years after the armie of Greece, failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troep. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to raigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sofisibus saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philochoerus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirmes that he lived while Agefilus governed Lacedaemon; and that Lycargus in his young years, about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan war. Eusebius seems to make him to have beene about the time of Josias King of Juda, 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affyrinus he citheth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greece writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Pheonius, Aristaeus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyrias, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Anulus Gellius reports that Philochoerus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they lived together some certaine years, where-in hee confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written upon a Trevir, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about 140. years after the fall of Troy. Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of Pelias, King of of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liveth; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In digestion whereof Lucian faining himselfe to have bene in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that fort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Semyes, or after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepherisobris was his successeur, who preceded Taphres, father in law to Salemon.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time, according to Castiodorus, the Amalekites with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103. years before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not only by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung up somewhat nearly together, sixe Kingdomes into greatneesse, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latines in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the forme of government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring nations, who by entrenchance of times had subjected the Judeans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Iturians, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistines, Jebusites, Geshurites, Machabites; all which acknowledged David for their Sovereigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of David.

§. I.

Of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

He hazards which David ranne into while he was yet onely designed King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loved him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perfwade his sonne that David would assuredly bee the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Jonathan could never bee perswaded, never forc't, nor ever wearied from the care of Dauids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his household servant, and his Esquire, or Armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evill spirit, was adviced to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that hee might finde ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the jealous Tyrant some waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved onely through envie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a speare at David that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him ease.

Censorinus remembreth one Aesclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kinde of harmony, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes; and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the Command over 1000. souldiers to confront the Philistines withall. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistines: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistines would take Dauids head, than see their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and jealousies in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his owne house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeite both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistines, he covered himselfe in the Cave of Achis, and after conveying such of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him, into Mobab, he hid himselfe in the desert of Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which hee repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his master Saul was knowne to persecute him.

Of Achis David obtained * Siglag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judaea: but he bent his forces another way, and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complaine upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himselfe to Siglag. At his return he found the towne burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all againe: which hee did.

This armie of the Philistines commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes, with Sauls Crowne and bracclets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amalek, by a man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsly) that himselfe at Sauls request had slaine him. David, because he had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to bee slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that that every man ought to be beleaved of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unlessse some other prooffe informe the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus. & in cap. de pen. l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Gloss reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confitetur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in judgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre up sorrow, and move compassion in the heart of David.

The victorie which the Philistines had gotten, was so great, that some Townes of the Israelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left unto the enemy, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistines, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire.

Most

* It seemeth that Simeon never obtained Siglag till this time, for it is said in the 1. of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertained unto the King of Juda unto this day.

In F. de quest. li.

Most like it seemes, that the civill warre immediately breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easie victory over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Davids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to advance Isboseth (or Jebusur, according to Josephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Isboseth, David made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Juda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountered each other nere Gibeon, where it seemeth that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combate betweene the Lacedemonians and the Argives, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were only left unslaine. The like tryall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom David slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like tryall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this warre of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here; for the Army of Juda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Asahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turne upon him, wounded him to death with the stroke of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Roe, and, as Joskins reporteth, contended not only with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame if hee could have mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being overthrowne, and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this civill warre lasted two yeares, we finde it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention durd longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Isboseth had then reigned two yeares, when this was written, the Warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

A*Abner*, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in *David*s Favour, and in the commandement of his forces; by which he was growne so powerfull, as David forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himselfe; I am this day weak, and she men, the sons of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Joab, hee followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the bloud fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosie, to lamenesse, to the sword, and to povertie, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered *David*s estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath bene already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the armie of Juda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to David in kindred, and had bene partaker of all his adversitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefites, be made his partner. Indee hee was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that hee afterward slew Amasa his owne kinsman and the Kings, upon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joyned with himselfe as captaine of the hoste of Juda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour; and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoever Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seeme to have perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man fallest before wicked men, so (said he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Isboseth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee depaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great feare: in somuch as two of *Isboseth*s own Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to the have slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where hee was he third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IV.

Of the flourishing time of Davids Kingdome, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrows given to the Philistines, and the conclusion of the Arke to the City of David.

When David was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprife was upon the Jebusites, who in derision of his force, & confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which David soone after entered, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) hee became Lord of Hiernsalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Josua, and after them almost 400. yeares. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blind & the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Jacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my selfe, I take it with Josephus, that they armed their walls with certaine impotent people at first, in scorne of *David*s attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeares against all the children of Israel, Josua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posselt himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and received congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married moe wives, by whom he had ten sons in Jerusalem, and by his former wives, he had fixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeares.

The Philistines hearing that David was now annointed King, as wel of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his fear. And being encountered by David at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times overthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea to the Citie of David; which businesse was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeers it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with fancies, musick, dances, and all signes of joyfulness, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, & afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely, that hee forgat his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that shee disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the sonne of Ishai had built this his greatness: together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The warres which David had made were just, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who thinke by blood-shed & terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy & goodness, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his seede.

6. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1.

Soone after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlessse, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in halfe. For it is written, Acceptis frantum Amgaris de manu Philistheorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David tooke the bride of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bride of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casarea, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof & of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Junius in c. 8. of the 2. of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Jewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kinde, but inforced them to come downe into their territorie, for all yron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gave them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was endangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. shekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David & slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of David (left the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neere Geth, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversitie hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not knowne.

The Rabbins saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin always enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, hee led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the son of Zeheb King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made upon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recover his border) bee referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu opprest by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) hee had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines upon him at his returne.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmirena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which hee was to have marched before hee could have reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But wee finde that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrowne the Syrian army; nor bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, & of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, & the losse of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus (out of Nicholus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatness, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the A Syrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sackt the adjoining Cities of Beath, & Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which cities Ptolomie calleth Berab, Taubat, and Berathi be nameth Berathena, Tobu or Tbui, whose country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his son Jo- 2 Sam. 8. 2. partly to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadezer, & so because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse; all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (Clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold, but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicab the Egyptian sackt the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadezer were golden shields.

2 Sam. 1.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannu King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahash, the father of Hannu. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used David: messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre upon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all theaydes purchased, could put off or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalls of Adadezer twentie thousand, and of Muchab and Ishob thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retired into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walles, the other in their desarts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Maschab the North part of Tracanis remembered in Deut. 3. 14. Ishob or Thob a country neere Gad under the rocks of Aram. 2 Sam. 10.

Adadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent all the Companies that hee could levie out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian Armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Northeast, than Jerusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humbly) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the chiefest off journey that ever hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also posselt himselfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had hee two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betwene David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quiered their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forc'd them to tribute, 40000. horsemen, besides all their horsemen and waggons, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, & to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelpia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings Crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David led on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Jerusalem following the war of Uriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, & entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he used extreme rigour (if wee may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them hee rare with barrowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kills, in which he baked tyle and bricke.

Of Davids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

But as victory begetteth securitie, and our present wordly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giver of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandments. For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee began to bee advised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take *Uriah*s wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adultery with *Uriah*s slaughter, giving order to his trustie servant Joab to march him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the rootes (as hee hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witness of *David*s own mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, hee had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death hee suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his owne error in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet hee delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tennour following: Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, & hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this, David lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bathsheba. Secondly, his own sonne Amnon, being in love with his halfe sister Thamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah *David*s brother, posselt her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despitfull manner. Two years after which foule and incestuous act, Abisalom caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheepe-shearing: not per chance in revenge of *Thamar*s ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurpe the Kingdome, in which, because hee could not in any sort bee assured of Ammon, he thought his affaires greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his owne sister, and then despitd her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmi King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abisalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe, first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win unto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of *David*s sinne.

The company which Abisalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achisophel repaired unto him, & many troups of people people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Jerusalem with the Arke of God, from whom hee desired to bee advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, & servant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsells of *Abisalom*s party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsaillor, whose practices hee greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred *David*s prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightened) holding himselfe upon the advantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at David, and most despitfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forsooke Abisshai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possessor of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such publike place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that hee was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without feare of being given up upon a reconciliation betweene them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsaile) Achitophel indeede urged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now it was fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will rise up evill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and hee shall be with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: in show diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gave advice to Abisalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee employed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly beene embraced by Abisalom, had not *Hushai David*s faithfull servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which *David*s valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist: This delay in Abisalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeede, after God, the losse of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherinto Mephibosheth himselfe in the war against David after *Saul*s death feared himselfe. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the sonne of Nabash the Ammonite, whom David loved, & the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and propable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hannum*s overthrow: in thankfulness whereof hee relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to *David*s assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David, an office next the King himselfe, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces hee had to Joab, Abisshai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Joab, besides that hee was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when hee could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne servants dispatcht him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, hee embraced the present advantage offered. 2 Sam. 8.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David, hee mourned and forrowed, not only as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joyes, and seene every delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, covered themselves also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first, hee told him that hee had discouraged his faithfull servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a love and constance in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrarie, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, hee urged that it was generally beleevd, that hee loved his enemies & hated his friends; and that hee witnessed by this his mourning, that hee had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, hee used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening, And that will bee worse unto thee than all the evill that fell on thee from thy youth hither to. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom hee assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. Hee also accepted of *Mephibosheth*s excuse, whom Ziba had falsely accused and betrayed. 2 Sam. 19. 23.

Hee also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Jerusalem, that hee might reward his service done him: who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Armie brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. Hee received commandement from David to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abisshai, *Joab*s brother, was sent after him, with *David*s guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom hee murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the perswasions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, hee retrained his Armie to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel. 2 Sam. 20. 16. 2 Sam. 20. 22.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore hee willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also, if wee may judge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, atwell in the present as in the future, bee greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

2 Sam. 21.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sonnes of Rispah, whom hee bore unto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom shee bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites: Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Davids wife, hee whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when hee slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinned, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weighie as a Weavers beame, when as by the same eclipsis it must bee understood by the brother of Goliath; Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number & quality, that people of Israel is not knowne to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Capitaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Over these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have beene given upon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abisithai brother of Joab, who in the warre against the Ammonites & Aramites was Lieuteneant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was laine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearnesse of blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approved services. All these Coronels and Capitaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to have beene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and beene hardened with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Capitaines and Coronels, (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make up the number of 37.) were the speciall men of warre, and reckoned as Davids Worthies. The long reigne of David, as it is knowne to have consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we finde no where mentioned. For the sonnes of Zervia, who had bene too hard for David, were worne away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abisithai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

3 Sam. 23. 39.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that hee had reigned now 33. yeeres or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that hee enjoyed about seven yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in offerntion of his power in which hee employed Joab, with other Capitaines of his Armie, who as yet nine moneths and twentie dayes travell, returned with the account & register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda and the cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand. 2 Sam. 24. 1 Chr. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seven yeeres famine; 3. moneths warre, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three daies: David made choice to bow himselfe under the hand of God only, and left himselfe subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 700. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great. 2 Sam. 24.

of the last acts of David; Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LASTLY, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet advised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Ammon and Absalom being now dead) having drawn unto his partie that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of Davids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) hee presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs presumption) the King calling unto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Capitaine of his guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon, attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choicest men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might bee disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the businesse publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Capitaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who did repair unto Jerusalem. 1 Reg. 3. 1 Chr. 28. 19.

In this assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choise of him among all his fathers sonnes. In this manner hee said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to bee his successor: whereupon hee earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conforme themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution. 1 Chr. 29.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that where as hee himselfe had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, & ten thousand of silver; besides brasse, iron, and and jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of so religious a worke. This buis-ness being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himselfe even in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprises, hee uttered these mighty words: Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, God fastened the succession, and prosperity of his issues. For this done (saith God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posterity to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, hee advised him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saving that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his matter yet living) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenge, so was it his will that Joab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, & suffer the same violence which himselfe had unjustly strooken others withall. Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner & Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meere jealousie of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or supplant him, yet God (desiring the policies of wicked men) raised up Benhadad the sonne of Jeboadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace, and to this apparent & just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimeley setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Joab the sonne of Serviah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Asaph, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words used to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Abisai; or whether it were the publishing of David's letter unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their matters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath overthrowne many a worthy man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himselfe lived, yet being dust and in the grave, he slew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his patterne, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as sonne as himselfe was buried, having made promise to the King of Spaine when he delivered Pool unto him, that while hee lived hee would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, and Resin of Damascus, to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize upon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the Captaine of the Host was dead. Now when David had reigned in fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeares, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces, hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, hee was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which hee wrote witness his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus

Paulinus: David Simonides nofter, Pindarus, & Alcaeus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, &
Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterii ab inferis fuscat resurgentem, David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcaeus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, bee playeth Christ on his harpe, and one a ten stringed Psalter hee raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretellethe Christ more lightfomly and lively than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Exchias; but whether all the Psalmes were written by David, it is diversly disputed. For Chanasaph, Cyprian, Lyrans, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles of the severall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only
73. Psalmes were composed by David himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius
David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the sonnes of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which David wrote not, Sixti, Senensis nameth as followeth, Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of David's singers) Asaph, Ethan, Exchias, Eman, Exaiira, Idithun, and the three sonnes of Chore. But
S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Psalms, & so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith hee) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only to David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others; this opinion (saith he) Vox Evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalms 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Dominus meo, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a patrone to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Na- than and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the severall parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it seemes, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege fought for succour from David, and that hee stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time twixt David & the Trojan warre. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samsun Judges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and David died in the yeere 2991.

6. I X.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

His treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chro. 28. vers. 14
Is treasures for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and iron passing all weight, which is more than any King in the world posselt besides himselfe, and his sonne, to whom hee left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cartload, & a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threecore and seven-tene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appeare, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by such voluntaries as the severall tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a meane parentage, & perpetually vexed and invaded by the Phi- listines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part posselt by his enemies.

Therefore it werenot amisse to consider how David within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great

Monuments of these Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Uluka) they remained within these thirty yeeres, and are like to remaine still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed upon them.

§. X.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may bee spoken.

They defended of Caftion, who, according to Isidor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Eſau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or pettie principalities, namely, Asdod, Ascalon, Gath or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Caftion was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumaea; which Abimelech married Isaac his wife, as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocrasie. For they are afterwarde named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achib be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who againe gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him we reade of another Achib who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch backe his fugitive servant, what time the seeking of his servant was the losse of his life. Jeremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palastin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontide, without regall name governed Athen during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of sovereignty, but in honor of Codrus only. For when the Gracians of Doria, a region between Phocis, & the mountain of Oeta, fought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Affrya, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heracleide, the sonne of Evristhenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heracleide in Lacedaemon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agide, for many yeeres after. Hee restored the Lacemonians to their former libertie: hee overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like sort from the Scelavi came the world Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the country of Illyria, & made it their owne by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselves by a new name, Slaves, which is in their language gloriosus. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardiness, and not spined their wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of David, and say, that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

In the tenth yeere of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus, assisted by the Iones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoining of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was flaine by the Carians, whose countrie he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Eoles, which joyneth to Ionis; and that his posteritie governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythrae by the name of Bastides in Strabo's own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came higher out of Peloponnesus, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heracleide into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achai, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heracleide 100. years.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana there, in built, which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choyce marble polished, the worke being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnosſus. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop: to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so immortal. The other Citie posselt by Androclus in Bolis, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythrae: who lived 740. yeeres before Christ was born. S. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke copie certaine verses of this Propheteſse: which began (as S. Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Jesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator: Jesus Christ Son of God, the Saviour.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabbah in Moab, Naphres began to govern in Egypt, the time that was father in law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Naphres, are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated upon the river Maander, where Sisiphe gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best horſes of the lesse Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Mitya gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumaens of Bolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Isocrates. Eusebius and Cassiodorus finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of David, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Motinno the son of Baſidor, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Achastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Helians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Orseſtes, posselt the Citie and Iland of Thibes about this time. In the 32. yeere of David, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who saith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any account. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars unto David, soone after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the very beginning of David's reigne over Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seven yeeres in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30. years.

years before Salomon; unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII. OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Salomons wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan began to reign over Juda and Israel, in the year of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Jedidias, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anoynting, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like sort salute Hiram King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reign was peaceable. For soone after David's death, he caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiab the sonne of Jehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah's desiring by Bertheba, that the young maide Abisag (which lay in David's bosome in his latter dayes, to keep him warme) might be given to him. Whatsoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God enclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no: so it may seeme that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah's, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had bin Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Abisalom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it seemes was the depth of Isobabers quarrell against Abner, for having his sisters Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to David: I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with David in his latter dayes, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There may be divers further occasions; as either that he would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about David's last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Jewes: yet the kings of the Jewes were so absolute, as they did therein, & in all else, what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use this paternal authority in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely of Jacobs disinherit-ing Ruben, and giving the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joseph: of whom he made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appeareth by the words of Bertheba & Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authority to frustrate the elder:

elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it now here appeares in the stories of the Jewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgai: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had advised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, he tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands: Salomon chooseth Wisdom, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of selfe-love, to which the root of all impiety: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness, which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him whithall that which he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone he judged the controversy between the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

Hee then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Behold, a son is born unto thee; &c. He shall build an house for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Ezion-gaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaginn trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Buradai, Azerius, Vilalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Mafons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which is conceived, he selected out of the Profelites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were farre more skillfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raffles to Joppe, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine, that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassalls of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheate, and twenty measures of pure oyle yearly. Eusebius out of Eupelemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Huram and Hiram) King of Tyre in these words:

Rex Salomon Saroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phenecia regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater praecepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem praecepit: Scribo igitur & te, ut ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, & Phenicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send mee Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phenecia Rex, Salomoni Regi salutem. Lectis literis gratiag Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quantum scribis fabros, ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esset tibi mittendum, misi ad te milia hominum octaginta, & Architectum Tyrum hominem ex matre Judaea, virum in rebus architectura mirabilem. Curabis igitur in necessariis non egerant, & Temple Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

Suron of Tyre, Sydon and Phenicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdom. And because you write that Carpenter and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourescore thousand men, and a Master builder, a Tyrian, borne of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessities be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Josephus time, as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene (saith he) Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different termes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But werethis intercoure betweene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupelemus or Josephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupelemus in Eusebius, I do not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth booke: neither is it in Josephus in the eighth booke and second chapter of the Jewes Antiquities: it being a vaine title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, inso much as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinnesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Jesua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Berothon, Gerar, & the Millo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh, as it seemeth in favour of Salomon, came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and Territory he gave Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable, that because Salomon was then buied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hetherby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for; and in his son Rehoboams time Shebact this mans successor did sack Jerusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desert of Juda, or (as Josephus thinks) Palmira in the desert of Syria; which Palmyra, because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wane Damascus; it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calls this place Thadmora, by which name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams servants: Salomon offered Hiram twenty townes in or neare the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis Gentilis erat. Nor that it was possess'd by the Gentiles (saith Nauchrus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further he made a journey into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first & last warre (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumaea, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Elath the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pinedas conceits of two strange passages about Affricke.

Here Salomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet passe to the East India, which was not farre off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manila, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with lesse labour than they do in any one part of Peru or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450 talents: whereof 30 talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420 talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of sixe hundred sixty and sixe talents of gold; that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearly, and which came to him besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedily returne to Jerusalem from the East Indies, than in three years; and that Tharhis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first booke.

Only it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would faine have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to bee the Tharfis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for love of his own country, and because of some affinity of found between Tharfis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the red sea, should return from the East Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages between Jerusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that wee have no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage between Jerusalem and the red sea, through dry, desert, and the theevish Countreys: and within 30. miles of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Country, have laden and unladed their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largenesse greater than all Affrick and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean, hindered Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar for this hee alledgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden Mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa: it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, forsaketh in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manila, finding in those parts no lesse quantity of gold (the small territory which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which otherwise he dreames of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharfis the Citie of Cicilia, was cast out in the Mediterranean sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterranean sea, and so through the straits of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that so he might have perhaps some sixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red Sea as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds; for the red sea. But in Jonas c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his owne rule, which in this place hee forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda; Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Saba coming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes, from Arabia foelix, & not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set downe at large in the Text. But herein Iosephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicoletis, Nicoletis, the successor (saith hee out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Menes the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garisons fourteene thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that hee spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, thre score measures of wheate, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deere, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stables of horses he had for his chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stables in the first of Kings the fourth, are to bee taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stables or teemes, and in every teeme ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darday; to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezra. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosephus writes them, Athan, Eman, Chalceus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Proverbs, and his songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publike Records of Civill causes, and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to bee inserted into Gods Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things, so had hee no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) hee tooke Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Herh: and when hee fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods; as Afteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumiza, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his owne servant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. Deus dam in peccatis animarum veris, aliorum peccatis misit, quæ ipse non fecit: God in punishing sinners, useth the sins of others, which he himselfe wrought not.

In the reign of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to ghesse at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the yeeres which they continued, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his nativity. Seven yeeres David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere hee tooke Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistines, who also troubled him in the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to have been in the tenth yeere of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time hee had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistines, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs have held him five yeeres, considering that the Aramites of Damascus raised warre against him, after such time as hee had beaten Hadadezar; and that in every of these warres, hee had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly upon the spoyle of the enemies countrey, partly upon the private provision which every soldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of David, in which hee tooke Mephisboeth the son of the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities; howsoever the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke every alteration that happeneth.

TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time hee established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leisure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judaea, and with such a multitude entered the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Judeans, Zerah of Ethiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Annie of five hundred and fourescore thousand, levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee overthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campes.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length betwene Ethiopia and Judaea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appeare how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Ethiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judeans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Belor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, & that Gerar was a frontier town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Judaea, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa tooke, as the cattell, camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoining, and not far off, and not unknown Ethiopians. And if it bee objected that these desert countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petrea and the Desert, which compass two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arme five hundred & fourescore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceede in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Baalsha a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adad, to joine with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baalsha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Baalsha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the division of Juda & Israel; for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred & fourescore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Baalsha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and amuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousand of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesse to lye undispatched, whereby the people being now intensive to the culture of their lands & other trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the success to the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baalsha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baalsha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his invasion) nor his successors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephtalim, without resistance, hee spoiled divers principall Cities thereof, & enforced Baalsha to quit Rama, & to leave the same to Asa, with all the materials which hee had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two yeeres continually tormented, he gave up the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There lived with Asa, Agessilau the sixth of the Heraclidae, & Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidae: Asartus, & Asarimus were Kings in Tyre. Asarimus took revenge on his brother Philetus, for the murder of Ithobalus Priest of the goodesse Asarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Asis and Cayus ruled the Latines: Pirithiades & Ophreatus the Affyrians: Terpsippus and Phobus the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successeur, that reigned fifty sixe yeeres, even to the 16. of Joas.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegiance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Jeroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heave vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reigne over the ten Tribes. One son Jeroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-holde his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred, yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his heartfull memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeed his fathers last yeere of two and twenty did run along (how farre is uncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Baalsha, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. Hee did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that hee little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, & besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous losse of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slaine he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, & not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God, that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infect Asa, by fortifying Ramah, but wast diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did wast his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nephthali. Fourteen and twenty yeeres hee reigned, and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the son of Jeroboam had done, two yeeres current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Jeroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting & drinking with his Ministers, whereby hee gave such advantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, and by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, hee stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his reign with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to have reigned: accounting it is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; & therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the reign of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; where by it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up anew head, who doubtlesse would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his aid, some strength, this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have bene effected by these troubles.

ANie man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mightie Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed Nations, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yielding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, as a man forsaken; and to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that GOD was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will the cause of all things) unlesse it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as hee forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betwene Israel and Juda, so many yeeres following: wherein Asa so farre prevailed, that hee won a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes, moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new tyrants, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have bene laid upon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him; which as it might serve alone to prove, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Baasha, (Asa his mortall enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardness in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seeme to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes, moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the son of Jeroboam, who followed the wars in person, as a man of spirit & courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppress them; not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant follie of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choose Jeroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them; for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised idolatry; where hee told the people, that it was too much for them, to travaile so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his son, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtship of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King, that hee still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole army of all Israel joynd with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboam house.

Now the reign of Baasha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his son; who likewise appears an unprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs bee, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good forme of Civill government, which happily hee reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to doe. And surely hee that shall take pains to look into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of justice, will finde it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of David, as to thinke all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeede by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without fortune of judgement, they suffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealousy: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary justice (under which it may be supposed that many were cast away) hee would have slaine Jeroboam (if hee could have caught him) before hee had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confinement out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to have ended wrong, having not offered any.

* Chron. 24. 21.

* King. 2. 1. 16.

* King. 6. 31.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jehoram did upon his brethren, & upon sundry of his greatest men; as also Joash did to put to death Zachariah the son of Jehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till hee replenished Jerusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sinne, wherewith he made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, unlesse perhaps the words of Jehoram the sonne of Abab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of Elisba the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether hee meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Amorites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Nabab sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Nabab did not feare to stand upon his owne right, though Abab were even sicke for anger; neither was hee for that cause put to death, as upon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judicial forme, which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

* King. 19. 10.

The murder of the Prophet is continually ascribed to Jezabel, an impudent woman, and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, & laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are registered) prover them to use a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Abazias and his brethren, slaine by Jehoiachin, with the destruction of all that Royall seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stirre up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddennesse and uniformity testifie the affection to bee generally, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seven yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannical abusing the government, whereon she had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so far from embroiling their hands in the blood of their Sovereignes, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good successe of treason, unlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seven remaine, whose ends how the peopleooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is presently said of the slaughter, committed on Ababs children by Jehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging to forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions; howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural Sovereigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royall person: which if any man impute unto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his 100. hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarches need not to feare any curbing of their absolutenes by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will bee sure to come in on their side. Though indeede the storie might very well have borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and throwdest Politicians: every Sheriffe and Constable, being sooner able to anne the multitude in the Kings behalfe, than any over-weening Rebelle, how mighty soever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldome found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept usually difarmed. For otherwise it would have bene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Abab, a stranger to the Royall blood of Juda, should by the onely authority of a Queene-mother have destroyed all the seed of David, and usurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Jehojada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set up Joash their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to give to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Dauids, & were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admision, holding the Crowne by a more uncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seeke to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new family, rather than they would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin; under a more honourable, but more heavie yoke.

So Asa having seen the death of 7. Kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leaving Jehosaphat his sonne to deale with Abab the sonne of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

§. VII.

Of Jehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Jehosaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happy; hee destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatry, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one he had silver, from the other sheepe & goates to the number of fifteene thousand & foure hundred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Jehobanani of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thousand, & under the commandement of Jehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbered together make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King besides his garrisons.

That Juda & Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in Dauids time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amazias enrolled all that could beare armes, & they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoshaphat that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude; it is not likely that he would have feared even the army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 111. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand under Adnah, and the 200. and fourescore thousand under Jehohanan, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eldad, and Jehoshabad: for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aides which Jehoshaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehoshaphat: Leaders had under him.

2 Chron. 17.

2 Sam. 24. 4.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he joynd in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Jezabel. Him Jehoshaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his son Joram to marry Athaliah, this Ahab's daughter.

Ahab perswaded Jehoshaphat to assist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites, to foretell the successe: who promised him victory. But Jehoshaphat believed nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Ahab made answer that he had one called Micahiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he alwayes foretold of evill, and never of any good towards him. Yet Micahiah was sent for to the King; but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise victory unto them as they did. But Micahiah spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall persuade Ahab, that hee may goe up and siege Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, & be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kinde did the devill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, encourage Ahab to his destruction. And as Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, & are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save & deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evill that hee punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, sicet non-to-dem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are every-where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fire throates. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Micahiah having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, & the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Ahab himselfe committed to prison: where hee appointed him to be reserved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Micahiah, not fearing to reply, answered, if thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Nevertheless Ahab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprieved by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damasens, joynd with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idumaeans to invade Judaea: who passe Jordan & encamp at Engaddi; & when Jehoshaphat gathered his army, the prophet Jahaziel foretold him of the victory, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: & so when Jehoshaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumaeans, & quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon & Moab set upon the Idumaeans, & brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other: in which broile Jehoshaphat arriving, took the spoile of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold & promised misled by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Jehoshaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joy in with Ochozias, the son of Ahab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had but as Eliezer the Prophet foretold him, his ships perished, & were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was overthrowne.

2 Chron. 20.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram the brother of Ochozias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda & Israel the Edomites joyne their forces, nor forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their army.

The Moabites, subjects to David & Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for vassals to Jeroboam, & so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth he was drawne into this war, both to bee avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joined themselves with the Syrians against Jehoshaphat, & thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Juda, & now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumaea, thereby the better to assure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon & Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Jehoshaphat. But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehoshaphat, it is not certaine; for in the 2. of Chron. 1. 1. vers. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab & Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, & to joyne themselves with the army of Juda. For, that they were numbered among the enemies of Jehoshaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain 2. 1. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoshaphat's death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumaeans having a purpose to rebel, misled the army of Juda & Israel, with intent to interble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirist than the armies of Craesus & M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elishta taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not onely Jehoshaphat and his army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy & godnes of God having ever been prone to save the evill for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his owne City, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel. Jehoshaphat reigned 25. years and died; he was buried in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the son of Hanan.

Broch. 161. f. 162.

There lived with Jehoshaphat, Ophrates in Assyria, Capetus & Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

In Jehoshaphat's time also ruled Macedas or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Agessilaus in Corinth; and Archilanus of the same race, of the Heraclidae the seventh in Lacedaemon. Badsorum ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochozias and Jehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the sonne of Jehoshaphat, and Ahaziah.

§. 1.

That Jehoram was made King sundry times.

JEHORAM the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirty two years of age, & lived untill he was forty years old, being eight yeers a King: but of these eight yeers, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his son Ochozias. This appeares by the severall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehoram Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahaziah the eldest son of Ahab. For Ahaziah is said said to have begun his reigne, in the seventeenth yeere of Jehoshaphat. Jehoram the brother of Ahab succeeded him in the 2. yeere of Jehoram the sonne of Jehoshaphat King of Juda; that is, in the next yeere after that Jehoram of Juda was designed King by his father; it being (as we finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of Jehoshaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Jehoshaphat, who governed absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth yeere of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoshaphat, the old King tooke unto him, as partner in the Government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Jehoshaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is evident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Joram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda & Israel, who did not always reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seem at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, & must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehoshaphat either to affume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdome, whilst he was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like having never bene done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honour, to resume it unto himselfe, or at least wise to deferre the confirmation of it, untill foure or five yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehoshaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that ever entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehoshaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betwene Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their owne in quiet.

2 Chron. 19. v. 2. and 3.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountaine of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those Kingdomes, against the uncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a jewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Abiah the daughter of Omri, & sister of Ahab King of Israel, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was son and heire apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Jezabel her brothers wife, that she durst undertake, & could thoroughly performe a great deale more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda & Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldom thrive by matching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed, as King, his son Ahaziah; not to much perhaps in regard of the uncertaine events of war (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micah (for he despised them) as inviting Jehoshaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoshaphat to change his purpose often, in making his sonne Jehoram King.

Many arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Ahab.

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, & abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children; which were begotten upon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not upon base women & meere subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crown; whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Jehoshaphat about the same time; argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly son. For the good King was faine to make his progresse round about the Land; reclaiming the people unto the service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda City by City. This had bene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, & the course of Justice bene perverted, by the power of such as had borne authority. But the necessity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spirituall causes, & to the Steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall over-seers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the son of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahaziah began his reigne (as hath bene already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram. Jehoshaphat sonne, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second yeere, even in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expollitors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private estate, untill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set downe, yet we may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondency with Jehoshaphat that his father had done; & made use of it. He drew the Judean into the war of Moab, at which time it might well bee; that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had bene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations betwene the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity betwene them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions therunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for feare of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himselfe might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing usual in mischievous fell natures, to be as abject & servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not onely with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtlesse had used unto their younger sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils:

§. III. The

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sonnes of Jehoshaphat found strong Cities, a awake defence, against the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their small overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken & slaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land, such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe justice, could hardly avoide the doing of many things derogatory to their yong Master; which if hee would now call treason, saying that hee was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in Religion, wherein hee was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe conduct unto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sinnes; but he used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up Idols on by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listeth, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; & having hitherto, since David's time, bene governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in proccesse of time should breake the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never bee reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many civill and foraine wars, the Jewes by sundry Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great city within Juda, which in the time of Josiah had a peculiar King, to rebell against Jehoram; and set it selfe at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin & of Dan, surre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it selfe in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have bene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe unto him: neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subjection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first & remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kinde entertainment: under Idolaters they must have bin without it, whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seemes that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to doe than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembered, wherein Jehoshaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especial charge to doe justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shalbe assiduous before you; Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, than he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than just proceedings of his son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the land had done, his heavie indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mightie Armies which Jehoshaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have overwhelmed any one Towne, and buried it under the earth, whither they might well in one moneth have cast into it with shovels, by ordinarie approaches.

But it seemes that of those great numbers which his Father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier losse, to let one Town goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loved, are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might have bin dreadfull unto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was delivered to him, which threatened both his people, his children, his wives, & his own bodie. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruell persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and evil kings; but were faine to denounce Gods Judgments against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have bin sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elijah prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the dayes of Jehoshaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we reade Elias for Elijah. Indeed any thing may rather be beleeveth than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heaven to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Juda, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have bin thus, as they are now, naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoyle in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thicke set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the

Romans,

Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to have bin, that spoyled Judas in the time of Jehoram. For their Countrey was alwaies barren and desart, wanting manuell Arts whereby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one halfe, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jehoshaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had bin enough to have driven away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought in to the field, had not the people bin unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these invaders tooke, was not his Place in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrey, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we readenot that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to convey away.

The slaughter committed by Jehon on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazias, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seed perished (only Joram excepted) under the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeares after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seeme so probable, that the sonnes of Jehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heave blows, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, untill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not untill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcase. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they nor the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his owne soune succeeded him in the Kingdom; who was guided by the same spirits that had bene his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entering of a dead husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatness, to retaine her favourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellors of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore she thought it unreasonable to make much ado about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to avoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, having made greedie use of bad employments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose evil inclinations their sinister counsells have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a busie time; when his friend and cousin the Israelites, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could have had no better leisure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband; when he was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither againe, unless they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish neverthelesse his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end, that all men might learne to submit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth unto them. For in such kind of unhappie subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

S. V.

Of the raigne of Ahazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Ohazias, or Ahazias, the sonne of Jehoram and Athalia, began his raig over Juda in the twelfth yeare of Jehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and raigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Tornellus, alledging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Dumini 1588. which saith that he was twenty yeares old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe give him two yeares more. Like enough he is to have bene young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsell, by which he perished. In matter of Religion hee altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to adventure his own person, which scaped not unwounded.

The Towne being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Jerusalem, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazias returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he raigned in all scantly one yeare, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part,) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay fore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing somenew plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work to leave his kingdom, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certaine it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heave judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elijah the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to have bin accidental; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine:

S. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Jehu, a principall man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearing unto him the Prophecie of Elizeus against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashon of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talke or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Elizeus was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose him selfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Jehu, who had upon the sudden this great honour throwne upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections, who joyined with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezebel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he reached swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queene Jezebel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazias comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royall there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the Sonne of Queene Jezebel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the Prophecie of Elizeus might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already achieved, and the Queene-Mother dressing her selfe in the bravest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out a Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Jehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made readie, and issued forth with Ahazias King of Juda in his companie, whose presence added majestie to his train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had bin more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, & there they met each other in the field of Naboth, Jehoram began to salute Jehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu soone overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he strook him dead, and threw his carcase into that field, which purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the blood of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahazias escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Jezebel might soone be advertised of this calamitie, if she did not wish her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when she least expected it. But the full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all halts, and painted her face, boasting with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she thinke upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the Sibbim, with which she besmeared her ryes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew neere, she opened her window, & looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehu saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, he made her presently to underfit and her own estate, by deeds & not by words. He only called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soon found them readie to offer their service before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own servants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: & she perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemy sat on Horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie under foot. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, murder, and oppression, with slow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Ahazias King of Juda fleeing a pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where hee lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this favour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was enterr'd with his Ancestors, having reigned about one yeare.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose son he was that succeeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdom, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 9.

After the death of Ahab, it is sayd that his house was not able to retain the Kingdom: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Josiah, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyle of her son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold upon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne herself, and reigne as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great places, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as so likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stir, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is seldome or never so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royal bloud, all of them in a manner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistines, began even then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faile likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she give him to understand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might; for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his owne unworthinesse, would not care what aspersions he layd upon the Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie not only his successour, but also the reverfioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might never be subject to any rising, but remaine in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such persuasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant thinke, that the onely way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands time, yet might she do it in her sonnes. For Ahab (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his owne-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgot herself so far in her wicked policie, that she lost all opportunitie which the weaknesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring unto her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faime some such matter, as boldly she might: being sure that none would aske to see her evidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or feare the sudden death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was young and unable to resist. We plainly finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahab, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Jehoram's house would onely have beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing wherof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath bin already in the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proved by Salomon upon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his naturall Heires, David had given proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion and was entering into another. Jehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David punished the kingdom, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if Athalia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue; either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehoiada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Josiah: Behold, the Kings son must reigne; as the Lord hath said of the sons of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crowne of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it fixe whole years, and a part of the sevenning good seeming securitie.

§. II.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

In all this time Jehu did never goe about to disturbe her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemio to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in waives against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retaine his own, much lesse attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventie living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them altogether into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeale to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie devised by Jeroboam, no king of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected

grace

grace of God; and further in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom should remaine in his Familie to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods providence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King; if God, whom (to retaine them) he now forsooke, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

2 Kin. 8. 12.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, whereof Haazael king of Damascus was the executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the Prophecie of Eliſeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shall thus be set on fire, and their young men shall thus slay with the sword, and shall dash their infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie upon all the Land. For the furie of *Haazael*s victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benadab to restore the Cities which his Father had won; whereas now they were faine to make world shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune & courage in murdering his master than had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wisdom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliahs Government.

2 Chro. 24. 7.

These calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to looke to things at home: as having little to doe abroad, unless it were so that she held some correspondence with Haazael, pretending the rein to imitate her husbands grandfather King Aha, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successe was faine to doe the like, being therunto forced by Haazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoever the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the povertie of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have bene exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small; and the store laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbery. Yet they up-held in all this miserie the service of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IV.

Of the preservation of Joas.

Ehaziah then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort up-held in those unhappy times. His wife was Jehoshabab, who was daughter of Jehoram, and sister to Ahaziah, a godly Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes it seeme that Athalia was not her mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted herto to be such as she was. By her care Joash the young Prince that reigned soone after, was conveyed out of the nurserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to passe that this young child was not hunted out, when his bodie was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was no good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had avoyded that cruell blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Joash was delivered out of that slaughter, he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might bee thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor woman that gave him suck, who foolishly doubting that she her selfe should have bin slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather sweare them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyfull tidings.

§. V.

Whose sonne Joas was.

†. I.

what her Joas may be thought likely to have been the son of Ahaziah.

Now concerning this Joash, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controversie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of Athalia, seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Sonne unto him, in regard that hee was his Successeur, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them; that thinke him to have bene, or not, the naturall sonne of Ahaziah. For whereas it is said, that the house of Athalia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that Joash was not properly called his son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom she had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now bee revenged upon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrefie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Jezebel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had bene heire to the Crowne; for she that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse envie, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needfull, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the child of her own son, of whose life she might have made greater use than she could of his death: where as indeed, the love of Grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessarie urgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

†. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUt (as it is more easie to find a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise bin) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which thinke him not the son of Athalia, set down in such sort that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Salomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustinus sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Bathsua the daughter of Amnes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) & after him Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, have likewise held the fame of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought upon good likelihoods, to have bin the children of Huria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundrie of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenensis, who follow the Hebrew Expolitions of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begotten of his mother, doe approve this exposition: for we reade of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did beare unto David, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did live. Sothe the rest must needs have bin the children of Huria, and are thought to have bin David onely by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not bin the son of Athalia, then must that pedigree have bin false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, that had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only bin of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and form of law, as any other might have bin. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawn many late writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Fructus Annii his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Ammian can make Authors to speake what he list.

†. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have bene the son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise hee would give him a light and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a sonne left him, save Jehoahas the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after those massacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that hee was faine to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved: for had all the race of Salomon more bene rooted up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have bene extant, of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoab, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not only legall issue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngest son of Jehoram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of David's line, by Gods especiall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Athalia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) revenged upon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie judgement laid upon Jehoram and all his children, onely Jehoab his youngest sonne was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Joas, which is called the son of Athalia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have bene. For it wasthe youngest sonne of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Athalia, seeing that he was twentie yeares old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to raigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeare of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before he was eighteen yeares old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he should upon the sudden, in his eighteenth year, become unfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeares following: each of which must have bin true, if this were true that Athalia was the same Jehoab, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Joas are easily cleared, if Joas and Jehoab were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seven yeares old when he began to raigne, which if we understand of years compleat, he might have bin a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of this sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall son of Jehoram, though called the son of Athalia, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoab, that soundeth much more neere to Joas, than to Athalia, in an English yeare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diversitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Athalia himselfe be also called Ataria, & must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoab, in which manner Joas might also have had severall names; yet, because I find no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine owne conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more ability to judge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Joas, if he were her own grandchilde.

If therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some unnatural desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the blood Royall. For whether it were so that Atalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chaste) had imitated the libertie of Jezebel her sister in law, whose whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her son; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certain it is that she had sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the crown upon her own children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimers. As for Joas, if she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better love their daughters husbands, than their sons wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her son; for she made him spend all his time in idle journeyes, to no other apparent end, than that she might rule at home; and he living abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Jezebel had cunning enough to be his Tutore. But when the sword of Jehu had rudely cut in sundry all these fine devices, then was Atalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were only stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

2 Kin 9. 22.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the libertie of using conjecture in Historie.

THUS much concerning the person of Joas, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diversitie between it and others, the lesse me thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deservin blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of conjecture. For all Histories doe give us information of humane counsels and events, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake only at randome, and many times falsely. This we often find in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jewes in Egypt unto Jeremie the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof, were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of Heaven, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to doe: For then (say they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding that all manner of miseries were befallne them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blinde is the wisdome of man, in looking into the counsell of God, which to finde out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written will not perverted by vain traditions.

Jer 44. 17. 18.

But this Historic of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have beene written by the most sufficient of meerely humane Authors: it setteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardnesse in battell; the ruine of his Familie, to the securitie of Jehoram in Jezebel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotion raised in Israel, by the coming of Jehu; but referring all unto the will of God, I mean to his revealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this Scorie of many great examples, gives most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor happ exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentlemen, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not only much of their ornament, but some what of their substance. Informing us to discover the passions which doe set them first on foot. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, & in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historical, nor Poetical) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or to the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every buisnesse; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pricke both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill mists, they conceale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industrie of an Historian, having so many things to wearie it, may well bee excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbearth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weak minde is more effectuell, than many that seeme farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or townes, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discovered, having fastened upon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeces, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian dames her bondwoman, did first move Darius to prepare for this warre before hee had received any injury, & when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

Herodotus.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirme, (having, I thinke, in every estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantiall reasons, have issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Friar, coming to visit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner estate, bene his familiar friend. This poore Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politician, to attaine unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: & therefore the more I thinke upon the Art of the Conclave, & your unaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what follie this world is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this bee referred unto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if wee list up our thoughts to that supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

*Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia
Diuosque mortalesque sursum, Imperio regit unus aquo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the winde-swolne streames,
The civill Cities and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heaven, and the mortall band,
Alone doth governe by his just command.

Then shall wee finde the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change, hee foreseeeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; He neither deceiveth nor can bee deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly governe all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea this broad and headlong passage to hell, is no less delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soule, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they have onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift & expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding us to perfect happiness, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of joy to the conscience, as doth easily countervale all afflictions whatsoever; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skin of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, & make them with themselves at their journeyes end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy, and as whose right hand are angels for evermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know; as the meanes to attaine unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captivity: wee may well believe that the counsaile of God therein, & the executioners of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, & the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, bene the lesse true, though they might have been omitted, as the lesse materiaall: but these things it had been lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any man of judgement will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faile, that rehearseth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every mans belief. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now sixty yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Juda, and had found neither any forreine enemy, nor domestically adversarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, & reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to bee such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had bene very unfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to have bene indured with the stomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Jehojada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe over all the Country, if care were not used to weede it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated unto himselfe five of the Captaines, in whose fidelity hee had best assurance; and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord unto the house of David, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succeede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, & other associats of Jehojada able by close working, to draw together so many truly and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard: and that was enough; for if the Tyrannesse did not prevaile against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, where bestowen in the utter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, where in this high designe was to be put in execution: Jehojada delivered unto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crowne; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddenesse, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, under the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, & noise of folks in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much unusual passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, shee meant to use her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that she thought it some especiall solemnity in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the towne, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that shee little thought upon her owne Tragedy; although Josephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, she rent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine upon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Josephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she would surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like to a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had been meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their owne weapon, could prevaile to let in her guards, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of seven yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom the Law to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have beene expected; so that at his appointment, shee was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood, save her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

Mostlike it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throate of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet shee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse and a Murtheresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their time in satisfying her owne affections; the one using tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more lesse to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indigntie, and shame of bodie. Touching their buriall, Jezabel was devoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elihu; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to have beene her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is uncertaine; she had sons living after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her; we doe not finde.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as neerely, and beene registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, & being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Jebu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of Joas his doings, whilest Jehojada the Priest lived.

By the death of Athalia, the whole countrie of Juda was filled with great joy and quietnesse; wherein Joas, a childe of seven yeeres old or there-about, began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully governe the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, & restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Jehojada two wives, & began Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of David which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of ungodly Tyrans; and requisite it was that hee should up-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had up-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Levites were more slacke than he, but even Jehojada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke; partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people: who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver, and with all other Utensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had beene, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. II.

The death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUt this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty yeeres, dyed before his Countrey could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preferred the race of them, & restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funerall seems to have bin given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of David. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that hee was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heauey debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, hee soone forgot, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea & God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where-with Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrey, in fifteene or sixteene yeeres, that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himselfe, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King in liberty, that he regarded no longer the lowre admonitions of devout Priests. Hence it appeares, that his former zeale was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Joas.

BUt God, from whom hee was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily bee shaken off. Haazel King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Jerusalem, without the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke hee did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, & leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme misery, to the fury of Haazel himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Haazel should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre up against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather advance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Joas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to joyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for their rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who, like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which hee was a subject. If this were so, Haazel had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdome of Juda. Howsoever it were, we finde it plainly, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore rooke all the hollowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Haazel departed with a rich bootie of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirtie seventh yeere of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere he died, leaving all that hee had unto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprife of Haazels, is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly prove, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, hee lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Haazel himselfe was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the Sonne of Haazel) is said to have bene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vaine; for God was against him) to deale with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Haazel was in the time of Jehojada the Priest, because that storie is joyned unto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Jehojada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second booke of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will & pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgements upon the house of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Jehojada; soone after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very leamedly collect) in the fixe, or thirty seventh yeere of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have alwayes tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, & either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that hee dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew to forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had stroven to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous patterne unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

Isaiah. 15.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Jehojada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and revered, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of

of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne unto the King, and the uncountable benefits, which they had done unto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though hee had bin otherwise a man of very small make, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appeares that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard, who said, This is the heire, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprizing him by any close treachery; I doe neither reade, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which hee suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

2 Chron. 24. 24.

THis odious murder, committed by an unthankfull snake upon the man in whose bosome he had been fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well-describ'd curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence; which fell downe swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monster. It was the last yeere of his reigne; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to live how he list without controulement. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them than they themselves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement, proofe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Haazael, when hee might have leav'd (as his son after him did multer) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when hee might have his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, hee tooke a very great Army, so that wife men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Country, and expose himselfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what ado he made above that, which in all apparant reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings. As for Joas himselfe (as Abram and others expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ranisme.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgements; & that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favour'dly. Now at that time Joas the sonne of Jehoiada, reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Haazael over the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant under-taking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country; the other inferiour every way to his father; of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition follow'd betweene these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward follow'd, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and plucke up his spirits; which Haazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of warre at his doores; it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good successe hereof, already related, & the (perhaps as unexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Juda, after more than forty yeeres time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small companie of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, having so bene trodden downe by Haazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Footmen were left; prevailed against his Sonne, & recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every where found, & therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed wee should not, if we be Gods children; thinke it more tedious to heare long & frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they list'd, & saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoile, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike filling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitess, & of a Moabitesse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are exprest) thinke to have bene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, left (as Tyrants use) hee should revenge his disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture telus plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Jehoada, this befell him. And the same appears to have bene used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the sonne and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was judged unworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caus'd the treason, wrought against the King, to finde more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recomenced by his sonne, upon the Traitors, with well-deserved death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Metades & Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Arifomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Aladus, were Kings of the Albans in Italy: Ocraxepes, commonly called Anacyn-darces, the thirty seventh King succeeding unto Ophraianes, began his reigne over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Joas, which lasted forty two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres younger than Rome, others above 400. yeeres elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertaine whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeer of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make cleer the totall summe. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeeres, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion, we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books hee gives us the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh yeere of Joas, was a hundred forty and three yeeres before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that wee might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

of

AUSON. lxxv.

Illa ego sum Dido vulu quam conspicis hospes,
 A simulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
 Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxis, erat mens,
 Vita nec incessu lata cupidinis,
 (Namque nec Aeneas vidit me Troius unquam
 Nec Lybiam advenit, clausibus Iliacis.
 Sed furas fugiens, atque arma prociis Iarba,
 Servavi, faveor, moris pudicitiam;
 Pellere transfixo caecos quod perculis enses)
 Non furor, aut Leno crudus amore dolor.
 Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere fame,
 Ultra virum, postis manibus appetii.
 Invida cur in me stimulaſti Musa Maronem,
 Fingeret ut nostra damna pudicitia?
 Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
 Quam qui furti a Deum concubitusque canunt.
 Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
 Humanisque deos asimulant outis.

Which in effect is this.

IAm that Dido which thou here do'st see,
 Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'rie,
 Like this I was, but had not such a soule;
 As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Aeneas never with his Trojan hoast
 Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
 But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
 Not mov'd by furious love or jealousy;
 I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
 Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
 This was my end; but first I built a Towne,
 Reveng'd by husbands death, liv'd with renowne.
 Why did'st thou stirre up Virgil, envious Muse,
 Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
 Readers beleve Historians; not those Which to the world Joves thefts and vice expose.
 Poets are liars, and for verses sake
 Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew & flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many Histories: but in particular we finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, untill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

S. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne: Of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazias, the son of Joash, being twenty five yeeres old when his Father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himselfe, as his new beginning reigne might bee least offensive. The Law of Moses hee professed to observe; which howsoever it had beene secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himselfe unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King upon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evill end. Hee therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the hate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, & so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Jehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazeel and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his sonne Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this politique Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporal matters the ten Tribes recovered space; but the favour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not finde, nor beleve that they sought: that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reigne of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heave cares attending those unhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burthen upon his hopefull sonne; we finde that in the thirtieth seventh yeere of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the sonne of Jehoahaz began to reigne over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did for his husband that poore stock that he received from his Father, often Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that hee might seeme likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which hee speake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse, For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake unto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdom in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first yeere of Joram the sonne of Abah King of Israel, died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehoi. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that hee did not only raise a dead childe unto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, hee pleased God that his dead bones should restore life unto a carcass, which touched them in the grave. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazias his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Joas.

THE happy successe which Joas had found in his war against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazias a desire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand servicable men for the Wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of war hee had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty yeeres beene unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his father Joas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of silver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This great Army, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse before hee had employed it, being threatned by a Prophet with success, if he strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gave them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men, and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazias with his owne forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as just enemies. This victory did not seeme to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crowne of Juda; which might bee the cause of that severity, which was used to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazias took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have pursued the conquest of the whole countrey. Howsoever it were, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods; which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this unworthie King Amazias, that he set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, he gave a churlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had ravished the kings fancy; he thinks, he should have rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much upon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is sayd, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau having broken the yoke of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazias did hope to re-conquer the Countrey of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their owne industrie, courage, or force-fight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entering into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giver of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave checke to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Cannon; every one striving to magnifie himselfe, whilst all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better success, than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of this happinesse; so he whose mere wisdom and labour hath brought things, to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth itselfe with confidence of acceptance, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & se quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophie Amazias (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had thrust himselfe a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to David: of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiecie following) Iosephus doth yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Jerusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seize that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the consecrated vessels, calling the familie of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had bene officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taking it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the residue of a few dayes, might, by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by unadvised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to understand their first error; they will thinke upon every advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women: and rather chosse by desperate resolution, to correct the evils med with tile-stones; than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the bodies, growne out of their former cowardise, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the bodies, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakenesse of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard teares, that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the State, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant maner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Seigniorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptorie words made the French betwix themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that brave Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other business (and so perhaps had Joas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of hosties, usually drawes every Citizento save his owne, leaving victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, women can quench, as fast as the enemies, having other things to looke unto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who upon the uncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Jerusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soever Joas might hold himselfe within Jerusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Juda, which had bin more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and give him a checke upon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being upon returne, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to coole the ambition of Joas, and keepe it down from aspiring to the Crown of Juda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet, who, when this Joas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred unto the fifth, sixth, and seventh yeares of Joas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, it might the King of Israel have likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worke could he have either lent the Judean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisba, that after three victories Joas should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Syrian, taking advantage of Joas his absence, gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his return was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie; we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his son. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Israel from under the Heavens, he preserved them by the hand of Jeroboam the sonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Raigne of Joas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Arthalia, and Haazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craesus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they tooke to set upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these) Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of Juda, and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad wel-come, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsook also his life in few moneths after, leaving his kingdome to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant son.

The end of Amazias his Raigne and Life.

Any man is able to ghesse how Amazias looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatening to worke wonders, and set up a new glorious Empire of David, was now uncled of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had beene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazias (besides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happen by their owne default) there was no child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of War, being himselfe a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amazias was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard march, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while they should soon have bin rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have served to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good king delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as Joas to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had bene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem: a manifest necessity hath inforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the kingdom of Israel: The space of time between Jeroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariabs reigne, and such another gap found between the death of Pekah, and the beginning of Hosias, have made it easie to be admitted into the death of Pekah, and the beginning of things as they stood in Juda, when Amaſai was slain, both make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the necessity of computation were not so apparent.

For the publique furie having so farre extended it selfe, as unto the destruction of the kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining more redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such exorbitant mytie. We neede not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of Royallty, is nevertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetfull subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been King but one and twelve years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too hardly with the Text. The best opinion were that which gives unto Jerobam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign single in the fifteenth of Amaſai; did not so swallow up almost the whole reign of Joa, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat as were only current) and take the shortest the reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amaſſa, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Iſrael; Cephenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylveſtus, Indius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diogenes, Arceus, and Arifphon in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theſteſtus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achæians, Gerathæa, Amyclæ, and ſome other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Affyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazya, succeeding his father Orozaptes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty years, and was slain the last of the eleven voyd years which fore-went the change of Agaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Prince he was, passing away his time among trumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he liued an unhappy life, knowing himselfe to be foolish, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and striving to counteract a harlot, that he thought it a great shame to liue under the command of so unworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so bale subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belus or Belusius a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces was pleased with the prophetic, did promise vnto Belusius himselfe the gouernment of Media; and so concluding how to handle the businesse, one of them stirred up the Medes and allured the Persians into the quarrel; the other perswaded the Babylonians and Assyrians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed forty thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage at the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his retirednesse. For in the

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamennus to keep the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninive; which, till new aydes that he sent for should come, he thought easly to defend; it having beene prophesied, that Ninive should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninive, enough hath beene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well wittualled, that Arbaces having in two battels overthrowne the Kings Armie, and flaine Salamennus was faine to lye two whole yeares before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were an hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe upon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeares, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his wives, eunuchs, and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus upon one day : but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drinke and make merrity, encouraged others with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might be known.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Affryia; from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I beleeve that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orofius hath it, incessantly) buyled in offensive or elfe defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diadorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memorie. Whatsoever they did, that which Theopompus Antiochenus hath laide of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Uzziā.

S. I.

The prosperitie of Uzziā, and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Salum, Menahem and Pekahia.

Uzziā, who is also called Aha'ia, the son of Josham, was made king of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Joas king of Israel. Hee served the God of his father David, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. He built Elath, a Towne that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistims, of whose Townes he dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also he got the masterie over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of war, over which were appointed two thousand and sixe hundred Captains. For all this multitude the king prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Arms requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late predecessours had held, who thought it better policie to use the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Uzziā were farre more important, than the atchievements of all that he had reigned in Juda, since the time of David, so were his riches and magnificent works equal, if not superiour to any of theirs that had bin kings between him and Salomon. For, besides that great conquests are won to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happinesse to get. He turned his lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandrie. In other places he had Cartell feeding; whereof he might well keepe great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cartell and Heardsmen, he built Towers in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the wilderness; it being hardly palatable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Elath by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two kingdoms. For as Uzziā prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he won the Royall Citie of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is, (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bin in the reigne of David.

But

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now againe it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so precious, that neither the kingdom it selfe given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politike Idolatry; nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the sonne of Joas, after a victorious reigne of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his sonne should forthwith have been admitted to reigne in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crowne passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King having bene so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did passe before Zacharia the sonne of Jeroboam was, by uniforme consent, received as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance are likely not to have bene wanting, upon which the wisdom of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the army (who afterwards slew one another so fast, that in fourteen years there reigned five kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdom asunder, holding each what hee could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzziā, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzziā) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Uzziā, in the last fixe moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) & by the same reason abridge this Anarchie that was before the reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove that the kingdom of the ten Tribes was no lesse dis tempered than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reigne unto his owne; which was it selfe indeed so long, that he may well seeme to have begun it very young: for I do not think that God blessed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was voyde, before the reigne of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths only was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justifie the judgment of God, whereby he was slain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Salum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the slaughter of Jeroboam, and for the eradication of Ahab's house.

Zacharia

Zacharia having bin fixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who raigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; save only that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Jabel, whereby his father got to honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was to faile. Manifesting that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiphah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the son of Gadi, raigned after Sallum ten yeares. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie been used in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Disdaine, and other private passions, to have bin the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeared, with a thousand talents of silver, levied upon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his own establishment therein: some factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) sought to use his helpe, in deposing this ill beloved King. Joseph reports of this Menahem, that his reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeares, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia his Sonne occupied his Roome.

Of this Pekahia the story is short: for he reigned onely two yeares; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Pekah the sonne of Remaliah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menahem and his sonne, save that they were both of their Idolaters; and the sonne (as we finde in Josephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened unto those Northern Nations the way into Palæstina; it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion whether he were that Belofus (called also Beleser, and by some Phul Belochus) who joyned with Abaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that wee relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reigne and Life.

As the zeale of Jehoiada that godly Priest was the meane to preserve the lineage of David in the person of Jonah; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crowne of Juda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazia had endangered his succession. For he said of Uzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zecharia (which understood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meere gratitude and civill policy should have held backe Uzzia from inchoaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had bene silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoever, the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembered theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him understanding how little to his honour it would prove, that hee tooke upon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Josephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that he threatened Azaria and his Companions, to punish them with death, unless they would be quiet. Josephus indeed enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the high-ways, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the rooffe of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may have been true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Jeroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirtie yeares before Uzzia; so that Jotham the son of Uzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this account, have bin then unborn: for he was but five and twentie yeares old, when he began to reign as King. Therefore, thus far only we have assurance; that while Uzzia was worth with the Priests, the lypsate rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himselfe until he dyed; the rule over the Kings house, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son and Successor. Jotham tooke not upon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophet; which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

In the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah and Jonah. It is not indeed set downe, when Joel or Obadiah did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expresse, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painfully bene sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonah; who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to have prophesied in the dayes of Jonah, whilest the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Nineve was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the reigne of Uzzia likewise it was, that Esaie, the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esaie was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to have bin the son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, & whole Historie of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeare of his raigne, by our computation whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Nuzia took possession of the Kingdome of Juda.

B b b

After the death of Bacchoris, Afsehu followed in the Kingdome of Egypt: unto him succeeded Ansis; and these two occupied that Crowne fixe yeares. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeares, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Nuzia his Raigne and Life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the business of Juda.

In Athens, the two last yeares of Ariphron his twentie, the seven and twentieth of Ispeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Eschylus his three and twentie, made even with the two and fiftie of Nuzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Silvius Aventinus his seven and thirtie, together with the three & twentie of Silvius Drusus, and two and twentie the first of Silvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome in the first of Nuzia, wherein, after eight and twentie yeares, his son Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirtie yeares. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the storie of the Assyrian kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. I V.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belofus were one person, or heads of sundrie Families, that reigned apart in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly bene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him; receiving by his authoritie sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shewne upon Isabus the Babylonian, by whose especiall advice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generalltie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he used the counsel of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embellishing whereof of his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) onely the Sovereignty to himselfe, which to use immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Nineve, permitting the Citizens neverthelesse to take and carry away every one his owne goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loved, that by slackning too much the reins of his owne Sovereignty, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde in the Scriptures to have held some Townes of the Medes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deiotes the first of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to bee such as might in fourescore yeares, if not sooner, both extend it selfe unto the conquest of Israel, and teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineve, & subversion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Historie is made uncertaine.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthie man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a part the several authorities and arguments of sundrie men, adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, untill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belofus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skillfull Astrologer, subtle, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie yeares, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglath-phalassar his sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metaphrases were sufficient prooffe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no Historie at all. Forces manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captaines were with governments: but that any third person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne walles and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might bee kept downe from aspiring to recover the Sovereignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistressse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four yeares had erected their Kingdome a-new, under one Pul? or what must this Pul have bene (of whose deservings or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in division of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofus, whose neare neighbour-hood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Heredotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and silver that had bin in the Palace of Nineve. And questionlesse, to restore such a Citie as Nineve, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through an other mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belofus, Belofis, and Belstis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Astages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares;) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus having settled his affaires in Affrya towards the East and North, might with good leasure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may finde every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joynd with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrowne, did enter into this action, merely for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe over Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them, and made most fruitfull Province, adjoining to their barraine quarters, might yearly doe them inestimable pleasures; was not onely likely to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they who loved not Israel, should for their owne behoofe have given him intelligence of the destruction and civil broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavey neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their owne, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinitie; the memorie whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to looke into those parts: what a King reigning so farre off as Ninive, should have to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, left it should seeme to have ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie years, then is it likely that Belofus was either unwilling to stirre, or unable to take the advantage when it was waisted, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to seek after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did passe the river of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twentie years leasure would have afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to have bin lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mightie, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authoritie of Arbaces did restraints the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some have conjectured that all Affrya was given to Belofus (as an overplus, besides the Province of Babylon which was his by plaine bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that hee did onely inroach upon that Province by little and little, whilest Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menabem his Raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Affrya, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the restitution of Ninive, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of this reigne, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made untill Belofus could finde leasure; and the time of advantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that hee who conquered Affrya, and performed somewhat upon a Countrey so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have beene, at least, named in some History, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Affryans, done in those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Affryans, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate warre, which overwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine & utter desolation of Ninive, must needs have so weakened the state of Affrya, that it could not in thirty yeares space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if hee had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Scythians, & other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereto civil dissention of the inhabitants, & the bordering envie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belofus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Ariahabshi, and Ahabuerorsh, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countreyes, have called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our selves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affryan and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Belstis were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Ninive & in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aler, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to bee none other than Salmanassar, who is knowne to have reigned in those yeares which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabonassar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Asarhaddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures: They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premises upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Affryan Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were severall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Affrya. This is proved by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassar's name, is proper to the Affryans.

Esay 39. 1.

It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Affyrians, do shew that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Affyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the succellor of Nabonassar, which was Mardochepadus, called in his owne language Mero-dach-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esay his prophesie, Mero-dach, by the former part of his name; or Mero-dach Baladan, the son of Baladan. Now if Mero-dach the sonne of Baladan King of Babel were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Affyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar; which in Greece or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Mero-dach began his reigne over Babylon in the sixt year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanassar took Samaria; therefore if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Mero-dach, yea, and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the proving that Phul and Belosus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painfull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given such offence, that men refused thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howsoever I beleeve nothing that Annius his Berosus, Manetho, and others of that stamp affirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellows alledged in it: I have (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Neverthelselfe, I may say yet againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and serveth to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger termes them, meanings, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Affyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or unwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in generally) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force as cannot either be refuted or avoyded. It will easily bee granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Affyria, (some men doubt whether Scaliger reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Affyrian; yet what hinders us from beleeving that one man in two languages might be called by two severall names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas nescio quas, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophetas I know not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, but he was an Astrologer.

Scal Comm. 13.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have beene learned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him not to have beene also King of Affyria. The Emperour Charles the first, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Affyrian Souldiers, & Babylonian Schollers; but it seemes, that he and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise king Philip lost partly, & partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two un-anfwerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawne from the unlike found and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Mero-dach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Mero-dach, or Mardochepadus, his being the Succellor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to raigne in the sixt yeare of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections untill I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Mero-dach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scumple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here satisfie him; that how strong soever this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Mero-dach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have fashioned their Storie, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belsus, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Assurhaddon, which left alto Mero-dach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse my want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present unto us the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seene, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Seithus Calvisius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaliger learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not beene careful to give us notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Palsar did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not exprest in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe revoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these divided Kingdomes, in such sort as I find it contrived by Augustinus Tornilius; who onely of all that I have seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Affyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornilius is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeare; he appeares to me a man of a curious industrie, sound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes he hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to do right unto Tornilius; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and with that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and emboldened me to write more fully and less timorously in other things, which now I have not leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily passed out of my hand, and beene exposted to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I finde him adventuring as I have done, to say, that they may probably be thought to have beene some petty Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the most mighty, fought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Othavian, Anthony and Lepidus.

C. 1. 6. 13.

Another conjecture is (for Tornielius offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himselfe Sovereigne Lord of all, and placed the seare of his Empire in Media, appointing Belus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in four yeares, it came to passe by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Vice-Royes, made themselves absolute Kings. And in this latter opinion Tornielius himselfe leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why hee did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to ghesse. Having thus devised how Phul and Belus might, at the first, attaine to bee Kings, he orders their time and their successors in this manner.

Four yeares after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty yeares. Theglathalasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversifie them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne ten yeares; in whom that line failed.

The same time that Phul took upon him as King of Assyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for so it had been more likely) Belus usurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight yeares; at the least threecore and eight yeares did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are assigned fixe and twenty yeares: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly one and twenty to Nabonassar the father of Nabuchodonosor; who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more nearly resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornielius would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Assyria (for how Belus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. Headheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Assyria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it selfe, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unless his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all betwene them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Division it selfe, and the civill Warres that caused it, were never heard of? Questionlesse, the interverting of some Treasures by Belus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we must confesse the Dominion given to Phul to have beene exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to have beene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequell, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Belus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in foure yeares, as might serve to hold out in rebellion: for Belus it was needlesse to rebel, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his owne Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so unlawfull to thinke, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict so acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reigne in Assyria eight and forty yeares? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true that painefull and judicious Writers have found this number of yeares to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth, or probability, he be not beleevd for his own sake; though for our owne sakes wee make use of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty yeares the one, and seventene the other; Tornielius hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metaphrastes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reigne, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Tornielius gives the same length of reigne, which is found in Metaphrastes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Tornielius: and yet I could wish that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius in this businesse, wherein he himselfe hath chosen in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath used in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans; filling up all the space betwene the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight yeeres of Belus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belus might have begun his reigne somewhat later than Phul for threecore and eight yeares would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty yeares had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seemes by the story to have beene little lesse at such time as he joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty yeares, did well deserve that note (which Tornielius advicably gives) that if his reigne extended not so far, then the reigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

Neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornielius, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Sethus Calvisius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describing some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Loade-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neque feruida
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Borea finitimum latus,
Durat aequo sole Nives,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidis
Vincunt aquora Navis.

Nor Southerne heat, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subiect Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtle Shipmen way will finde,
Storme never to the Seas with Winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly beleeve them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serve alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had bene employed by his King in planning a Colony upon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Island; saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that shee, in imagination, might have an Island of her owne. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties: would it bee more shame to have beleaved in the meane while, Annius or Tornicellus, than to have beleaved nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to bee given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornicellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Historists than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having more over gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senators up within the State-house, and offered their lives to the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was haisty; for as fast as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him die: but the execution required more leasure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choice, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lacke of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the same King Xerxes, and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foote; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his body. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neare unto Elis; where also

Jupiter

Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neer the river Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reigne of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before either doubtful or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Ensebius out of Diodore, Cassio, Polybius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was overthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines have laboured to find out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian and Didymus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osias, or Azariah.

Ensebius, who is contrary to himselfe in this reckoning, accounts with those that finde the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundred and sixth year after Troy, yet telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Xerxes, which is (as I find it) two yeares later.

Erastophenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seven yeares after Troy, reckoning the yeares that passed betwene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus and many others adhere.

The difference betweene the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastophenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, three score yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more uncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the foure hundred and eight yeare current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to finde when they began.

To this good use wee have the ensuing yeares unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Erastophenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourescore and seventeen yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and forty yeares; forwards to the victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battell of Leuttra, thirty foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole summe ariseth to 453 yeares; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Xerxes, wee have arguments grounded upon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomically calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sunne; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece, and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first yeare of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty yeares: they who give him but twenty nine yeares of reigne (following Hierodotus rather than Tally, Iustine, Ensebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers in the first year of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexanders death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we finde two hundred and thirty yeares compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy yeares of the captivity of Juda, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seven years, and one hundred threescore and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Naxiab, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundredth threescore and seventh year of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from thence to Cyrus, whence we have a faire way through the threescore and ten years, unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reigns of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Naxiab.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, weretherein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whole-bus, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises that served onely for ostentation. Thicker also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having play'd the best part.

The Eleans were presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in aeternum ascensus es; that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not climb up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Quos Elae domum reducit Palma Castestes.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Eleian Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counsits) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have wonne the Victory at Running, or Wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and upon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne unto the Kings of Juda, & leave the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the body of this History into the coasts of Ionis and Hellestons.

§. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the sonne of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. Hee built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits upright, and there-fore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers & Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned fixe and twenty yeeres of whom Josephus gives this testimonie: Ejusmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie colerit, hominibus suis adeo iuste prae- fuerit, urbem ipsam tanti sibi curae esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hisibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus felix, justum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kind of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his verime and prudence he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Ser- vants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happye.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reigne was not long, but as happye in all things, as he himselfe was devout and vertuous.

Auchmenes about this time succeeded Phelisteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corin- thians erected Magistrates, which governed from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Tiglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he rooke most of the Cities of Nephthali and Galilee, with those of Gilead, over Jordan, and carried the in- habitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentz, hemius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reigne, but reckon them to Tiglathphalassar himselfe, who there- with reigned 27. yeeres.

Aschylus, the son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. yeeres. Alcarnenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diadore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. yeeres, and out-lived the Messenian warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion.

At this time lived Nabum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the citie of Nineve; which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred & fifteen yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

§. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth yeer of Pekah, the son of Remaliah: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reigne, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This Ahaʒ was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his son for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calfe, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gebinnam, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which unnatural, cruell, and diuellish Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthee hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, is by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of Aeneids— Sanguine placafis, Græci & Sibilis— Polvere cade Deus. Saturne is said to have brought this custome into Italy, besides the casting of many soules into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in-fomuch, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred up, and strenghtened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently cauled two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to bee slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed Nations, had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Puchios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massages, and others, in these his services. Pu- ther, as if he were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosia writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devill under this fearefull servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedness of this King Abaḫ, God stirred up Reḫin of Damascus, and Ḥakab the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entered it not.

2 Chron. 28.6.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possessed himself of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Jews out of it; and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judaans, of the ablest of the Kingdom, at which time Masfiiah, the Sonne of Achaz was also slain by Licbri, with Azrikam the Governour of his house, and Elcanath the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Samaria; but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered backe againe.

² Chron. 28.

As Israel and Aram vexed Juda on the North; so the Edomites & the Philistims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judaea, entred upon them from the South, and rooke Bethlemes, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Tinnab, & Gemz, slew many people, & carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe environed on all sides, & that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, hee fent to the Affrian Tiglatphileph, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings house.

2 Kings 16.

silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings houie.

Tiglatphileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father having lately made himselfe from a Provincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affrica, had a little before led him the way into Juda, invited by Menahem, King of Israell. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Acha, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himselfe, hee was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprize: because (as I have said before) hee was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglat, having now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territorie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin in the last of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Acha. At Damascus, Acha met Tiglat, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent to Abiab the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglat possesse all Babylon, and and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that hee was invited and waged by Achaʹ, yet after the Spoile of Israel, he posselt himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it seemeth, enforced Achaʹ to pay him tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Egechia, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, & therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Achaʹ had beheld and borne these miseries in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

English: Diadormus and Crefias find Anticarmus in stead of this Medidus, to have beene Engel. in Char. Silarmus his succcessor, to whom they give 50. yeeres.

Tiglahb Philefer held the Kingdom of Affrya, all the reign of Aba7; yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seeme to have reigned with him some part of the time. For we finde that Aba7 did send unto the Kings of Affur to helpe him. The Geneva note saies, that these Kings of Affur, were Tiglahb Philefer, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I doe neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Affur, were Tiglahb, and Salmanassar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath beene said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had beene hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred & thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later; namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every yeare, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abar died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftieth yeare of Uzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontide, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus. and was the last of their Governours: he ruled only two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governours for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Bu ghemaster, or Governor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Panjanias in his fourth Booke begins in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad. Eusebius & Halicarnassensis in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred years by the Sylvii, of the race of Aeneas, took end in the fame Achaë time : the foundation of Rome, being laid by Remulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the fame King. Cedemam builds it in the eleventh of Achaë, Bucholz in the eighth, as I thinke he should ; others somewhat later, and in the reign of *Evchi*as, Cicero, *Europs*us, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clemons Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seventh : who seeme not onely to ~~me~~, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

AND here to speake of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations possesse it before the arrivall of Aeneas, the place may seeme to invite us: the rather because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by divers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the seate, the other of the Ausoni, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassus thinkes to have bene the first, that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertility:
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posterity,
Tis from a Captaine name called Italy.
